The constitutionality of some of the provisions of this bill has been seriously questioned and ably debated. The theory of holding the county which permits the lynching for damages has been fully discussed. This bill, in that feature, follows the provisions of the South Carolina statute, which accomplished much toward reducing the number of lynchings in that State. Ohio has had similar statutes for 25 years. I was privileged to serve as prosecuting attorney for eight years while these statutes were in force. During my term of office mob violence was threatened but not accomplished. I feel safe in saying that these statutes have contributed much toward impelling all officers of the law to check against possible mob violence. Sections 6281 to 6289, inclusive, of the General Code embrace the Ohio provisions. Under their terms the legal representatives of the one lynched may recover $5,000 for such unlawful killing, which is applied to the maintenance of the family and the education of minor children. The county in which the lynching occurs may, in turn, recover the amount from any of the persons composing such mob. A person present, with hostile intent, at such lynching is deemed a member of the mob. If the mob carries the prisoner into another county or comes from another county to commit violence on a person brought from such county for safe-keeping, the county in which the lynching is committed may recover from the county from which the mob came unless its own officers are guilty of contributory negligence.

These sections were declared constitutional by the Supreme Court in a case which is reported at page 343, of volume 62, of the Ohio State Reports. May I commend to the membership of the House the reasoning of the Ohio Supreme Court, as set forth in that opinion?

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. I have but 10 minutes, or I would gladly yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Gentlemen from the South frequently remind us that we do not understand their problem. I often wonder whether they fully understand the conditions in the North under which the Negro lives. They state, and doubtless believe, that the Negro has far better advantages in the South, where he is better understood. Whether this be true or not, may I submit two instances in my home city? It would surprise many of you Southern Democrats to know that A. J. Davidson, a Negro, has been a practicing attorney at Athens, Ohio, for more than 30 years past; that he has always been a Democrat; that he held an appointive position in Washington under the Cleveland administration; and that three times he was the regular nominee of the Democratic Party of Athens County, Ohio, for prosecuting attorney. He was at one time my opponent for prosecuting attorney.

Mr. STEVENSON. Was he elected?

Mr. FOSTER. He was not. He was also a candidate against Hon. E. D. Sayre, judge of the court of appeals of Ohio. Another instance: Edward C. Berry as a young Negro came to Athens some 40 years ago. He became a cook in a restaurant. He was honest and industrious. Soon he rented a building and opened a restaurant of his own. Later he purchased the building. During succeeding years he acquired several adjoining pieces of real estate, and by industry and honesty has acquired and owns to-day "Hotel Berry," reasonably worth $200,000, which is the pride of that section of Ohio, and which has been complimented by all as one of the best hotels in that section of the country. The late Elbert Hubbard paid it his highest compliments. Mr. Berry is a Republican, has served with credit upon the city council, was a trustee of Wilberforce University, has rendered invaluable service to several churches, and has been instrumental in furnishing employment for several dozen Negroes who have attended Ohio University, several of whom have graduated with honors. Recently I met in this city a former employee at his hotel, who took his bachelor's degree from Ohio University, his master's degree from Clarke University, and his doctor's degree from the University of the City of New York. At the present time Mr. Berry is assisting several students to meet their expenses at Ohio University. It is impossible to estimate the good done by such a man for those whose ancestors were for so many years in involuntary servitude. These instances tend to show how such persons respond under reasonable opportunity. No thought of lynching ever arises. No occasion exists for the thought. They are working out their fortunes through honesty, industry, and education, and command the respect and consideration of all.

Both my observation and my judgment lead me to believe that this legislation will go far toward removing this disgraceful and barbaric practice. No man, though guilty, should be killed until he has his day in court. And we know that many innocent persons have been hanged and burned. Let us do our part to end this awful, indefensible practice. Law and order should be encouraged. Mob law should be ended. The laws of our Republic should be enforced. If equal protection is not granted by all States, then let the Federal Government intervene. That is what this law is intended to do. I shall vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. My time is exhausted. If the gentleman from South Carolina will extend my time, I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have no time to yield.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BOWLING].

Mr. BOWLING. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back half a minute.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARD] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WARD of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration provides that where a person who has committed a crime and as a revenge or punishment for that crime comes to his death by the violence of five or more persons his heirs or personal representatives shall receive from the county in which the death occurs $10,000, without regard to the money value of the life taken, to be collected through the Federal courts by sale of the county property or mandamus to compel the commissioners to levy the tax, even though that tax levy may exceed the limitation of the State laws and constitution; and if the person so suffering violence shall be carried into other counties both or all counties into or across which he is so carried shall suffer their part of this penalty. It has no application to the case of one who comes to his death from the mere malignity of the murderers. He must have committed a crime and must be murdered for and on account of that crime. The bill is, of course, based on the assumption that the whole county and State, represented by their officers and laws, and all who contribute to the tax, consent to the lynching or are well wishers to it or have broken a legal duty to him, and that assumption is left to rest on nothing but the lynching itself. This is the essence of its falsity and infamy.

I recognize the desire to reduce and to put an everlasting end to lynching to be worthy of the highest praise and the support of every good citizen. In the interest of truth, however, and justice to the States and their officers charged with culpability in this debate, it is most agreeable to note that this order of lawlessness is all the time growing less—has been doing so for a century, and especially for the last 20 years. That fact is clearly evidenced to the most superficial observer. Statistics support it to a most comfortable extent. Let him who doubts or is not informed turn to the literature of the early period of our history. He will find a keynote on page 214, volume 1, of Beveridge's Life of John Marshall. He will see by this the everlasting sociological phenomenon that lawlessness of this order has existed to a much larger extent than now in a social order that produced the most colossal statures of moral and intellectual character that have places on the pages of history. In the social order that produced Washington and Jefferson and Madison and Monroe and Marshall and Henry and Randolph and their compeers there were immensely more frequent instances of mob violence than to-day. This statement is not intended as a justification or defense, but only a defense of the general social order against imputations for the crimes of its undisciplined members, is proof that the highest social orders are not free from this undisciplined class, and emphasizes the injustice of inferences of culpability against the higher and better class of society that represent the principles and policies of governments and communities, and therefore stand responsible for the same.

To my mind, it is most unfortunately probable that lynching and other forms of mob violence, being beyond the complete control of governments and laws, will sometimes, though very infrequently, I trust, be repeated, as in the past, in different parts of the world, and especially in those parts where the white race of the American type predominate; where human character is impulsive and excitable; where chivalry prevails in a large measure; and where resentment, therefore, follows quickly upon outrages against personal attachments, until the dawn of a day when human character shall be completely reconstructed and the human soul regenerated. Laws and governments will perhaps never entirely stop it, and in their efforts, so far as they are only directed by force of penalties, will do little more than partially restrain it.

In rising in this presence to record her solemn protest against this bill, I do not admit any right or reason peculiar to North Carolina and to her citizenship to resent the astounding provisions contained in it. I do not recognize any particular application it has to conditions existing in that State as differing from any or all other States in the Union, because it is certain that mob violence is very little more frequent there than in the general average of other States, and if any differences exist to her disadvantage they arise very largely and certainly originated by reason of racial intermixture in the body of her population, giving rise to the crime of rape, and not the failure of the State to enforce the fourteenth amendment.

But the sensitiveness and the spirit of resentment which the State has a right to entertain against the efforts to pass this legislation grows out of what is not written in the bill, but hidden behind the curtain, as the real moving cause of its inception. Of this moving cause and hidden spirit I have no doubt and the public generally will understand. Men of equal intellectual endowments do not succeed long nor get very far at the game of fooling each other, and for that reason and on that principle of practical truth in the law of life the originators and supporters of this bill may attribute to themselves no flattery of success in the effort to counterfeit the real motive, but may be sure "their sin has found them out."

But, Mr. Chairman, I doubt if I ought to risk myself to criticize that hidden cause and motive. I doubt if my constituency will think I ought to call forth resentments and to intensify antagonisms, facing, as we do, the dangers before us. If I spoke for myself and not for that constituency, I would do so without hesitation. The fact that the majority of the Judiciary Committee of the House has reported this bill favorably, and the fact that that majority is of the same political cast as that of the overwhelming majority of the House, is alarming to the last degree. I can not forget how easily, if not how probably, my views may be overthrown, my fears realized, my State and her people insulted and their political and social sensibilities outraged by the imputation of a moral and legal delinquency, no less than that of consenting to the highest order of crime. I am in danger of being pummeled to death by the crude strength of numbers. I must, therefore, as one who "fighteth for his life," come to the House in the strength of simple truth and in the spirit of supplication, begging the opportunity and praying for the strength to appeal to a sense of justice and political propriety, and to reason the provisions of this bill to their defeat. In this spirit I beg every Member of this House to hear me a few moments.

I feel myself able, if the policy of the debate directed me to that line of argument, to show in a short time that every operative section of the bill is without Federal constitutional authority for its enforcement, especially sections 5 and 6, in whose cruel fangs the poison mainly lies. It seems as clear as a legal proposition can well be that the acts of commission and omission denounced in sections 3 and 4 could not in a trial court give rise to the presumption that the State had failed in its duty under the fourteenth amendment—no more so in and by the acts therein referred to than any other violations of property and personal rights—and that the fact of such failure could not be established as a foundation of Federal jurisdiction, and, therefore, the ordinary and reserved police powers of the State are obviously attempted to be usurped by the Federal Government.

In other words, the courts enforcing sections 3 and 4, as long as our present fabric of government stands and our Constitution survives, must find that the government of the State, as such, in whose territory the act of mob violence is committed and not the forbidden and disconnected acts of officers or individuals, has withheld from the person suffering the violence protection of its laws equally to and with certain races or classes of people as the foundation stone of its jurisdiction and authority.

There is no State in the Union from whose governmental attitude expressed in its public statutes and proclaimed administrative policies this fact would appear or could be inferred, and this is the only possible means by which it should be attempted to be found to exist consistently with a sound public policy, and the only one permissible under the Constitution. The finding is by this bill made by the false and fraudulent force of a judicial presumption. It could no more reasonably arise in this than in the pursuit of other crimes. As to sections 4 and 5 imposing penalties on communities and counties, the cases from the State courts holding State statutes of similar import valid, having reference to their own constitutions, do not even so remotely present the question suggested by these sections. The fact that a State legislature may impose a penalty upon a county, which is an integral part of the government of that State, for its failure to perform its cooperative and coordinate functions and may enforce them in its own courts, bears no legal resemblance to the proposition that the Federal Government may adjudge that same integral part of the State government to have failed in its functions as such and authorize and empower a citizen to sue for damages for the failure, sell its Government property in enforcement of its judgments, and thus possibly and by necessary logical deductions bring to an end this subdivision of the State government. It can not follow that a State can be forced by the Federal Government to do anything it may have the power to do voluntarily; if so, State autonomy is at an end and all functions of State sovereignty as well be at once surrendered.

It seems to me, I say, that I could make good this contention; but suppose I should turn to that line of argument and exhaust it, I should still be left without a full measure of duty performed and my fears still unremoved. I therefore prefer to beg the attention of Members to a more suppliant and personal line of reasoning, with the hope of dethroning animosities, touching sympathies and higher impulses, and encouraging higher conceptions of popular government. However gentlemen may protest the contrary, as sure as we live to-day, in so far as this bill has an honest foundation with the membership of this House, that foundation arose out of erroneous conclusions already arrived at from a want of a correct understanding of conditions in the Southern States; else it would surely direct its provisions to bomb throwing and similar forms of anarchy and mobocracy that have so shocked the public conscience recently in the great cities of the country and thus escape the fair and reasonable imputation of its purely sectional and racial application. No man denying this can possibly be honest with himself. And it is time that those conditions should be reexamined and seen from every angle and in the broad light of human facts and authorities that are universal and eternal.

The opinion prevails that Southern States have failed in their duty to a subordinate race under the obligations imposed by the fourteenth amendment. This opinion may, unfortunately in some instances, be an honest one. Propaganda and agitation may have been sufficient to get in their work and sow tares of error in honest minds. Organizations of northern Negro agitators have persisted in it. I come to you with the proposition that North Carolina has not failed as a State in the fulfillment of her pledges to the Federal Government, made when she assumed the burdens of the fourteenth amendment, nor have her officers done so in the execution of her laws. Although she assumed it after a resistance of rectitude of conscience and honest pride, she did so with a heart consecrated at the altar of suffering, and has every day grown and strengthened in her efforts toward its complete fulfillment, and has filled the measure of her duty to the Negro race to overflowing by her public education and charities and protection of its rights in her courts. In everything she has done her best, and a good best it is.

Touching the question immediately before us, I hope to be able to surprise you when I tell you with the solemnity of an oath that her pulpits, her papers, her bar, and her bench have poured forth a constant and unfailing appeal to the public mind against lynch law, to my personal knowledge, for 30 years, and not a discordant note from one in authority or from high places has broken the harmony of her strains. Thirty years ago her legislature passed laws on the subject, now to be found in her Consolidated Statutes, as follows:

SEC. 4570. Providing that the solicitor of the judicial district, whenever a lynching occurs within his district, shall go at the earliest possible moment to the scene and investigate before the coroner, justice of the peace, or judge, subpœna everybody and examine to the best of his knowledge, and bind over to court wherever possible clue is found.

SEC. 4571. No witness before any such investigating body can be excused from testifying, and legal ingenuity has here suggested that no discovery shall be used against such witness, this, of course, to avoid the inhibitions of the Federal Constitution.

SEC. 4572. All examinations of this character certified to the superior court within 20 days, and if the next court of the county convenes within a shorter time, such certification shall be made on the Saturday preceding the convening of the court. The written examination shall be laid before the grand jury—

And note especially that this written examination is made competent not only before the grand jury in passing on the bill but before the trial court, provided only that the accused was present at its taking. This last point has never been before the court, but I seriously suggest that the legislature in passing it has infringed upon the constitutional rights of the defendant in its zeal to bring him to justice.

SEC. 4573. The magistrate taking such examination is attachable for contempt for his failure to return it—

Another serious suggestion that the legislature has been a little too zealous and gone a little too far in its efforts to stop lynching. I do not believe the statute is constitutional.

SEC. 4600.—

Listen to this strong, sweeping legislative effort to break up lynching—

Courts of any adjoining county to that where the crime is committed have equal jurisdiction in investigating the crime, and the solicitor must send his reports of examinations to the grand juries of all of them.

Other statutes provide for the immediate calling of a term of the court by the governor and for the removal of the trial not only to adjoining but to distant counties, or for the drawing of venires from the boxes of such distant counties, thus getting a jury possibly further from the scene of the lynching than under the practice of the Federal courts. I do not hesitate to assert that the collective ingenuity of every friend of this bill on the floor of this House could not in the course of their natural lives improve upon the legislative and judicial devices, plans, propositions, and machineries to bring to justice the participants in lynchings in that State, unless and without resorting to such measures of coercion and compulsion as are breathed by the spirit of this bill, of the effectiveness of which I shall speak in a few moments.

Next let me speak of the efforts of the State and its officers to enforce these laws. For 25 years I have been what is called a court circuit rider in North Carolina. I make no apology for bad taste in the assertion that I know the legislative and judicial life of North Carolina. Four years a member of its general assembly, seven years one of its prosecuting attorneys in a district of 11 counties, 25 years an itinerant practitioner in its courts. During that period it has been a thing of rare occurrence that a judge has opened a superior court without throwing the force of his personality and official influence into that phase of his charge directed to the antilynch law. It has been thundered with the force of official authority from the bench to the grand juries and the assembled masses throughout the weeks, the months, and the years of the last three decades. When a lynching happens the rule is that the governor gets in touch with the neighboring judges, and in consequence one goes to the scene. The district solicitor is with him. The community is scoured, and the hearing frequently runs through days and nights. No charge of official delinquency was ever laid at the feet of a solicitor or sheriff that I recall. No sheriff in North Carolina would any more dare arrest a Negro for a rape or any other sensational or exciting crime and take him leisurely and calmly along the country roads in a direct route to the jail and expose him to public inspection than a priest would think of offering the holy bread and wine for public sale from the tower of Notre Dame. Without exception he rushes him in hiding in some circuitous and unexpected route to some distant place of safety. Every precaution that official discretion can suggest is thrown around the humblest criminal in my State to keep him from the hands of the mob.

Not a newspaper in North Carolina has ever touched the subject of lynching editorially without educating the public mind against it. Not a single bold and honest advocate ever justified or defended it, and yet it sometimes happens and, further, I fear, it always will. In the crucible of divine economy righteousness and unrighteousness, truth and falsehood, virtue and vice have had their intermixture. In the kingdom of heaven the tares shall grow with the wheat, "even unto the harvest." In less figurative language that means that the exemplary citizen will have to live with the violent, but does not mean he shall pay the penalty for his violence. If the self-conceited righteousness of any community under the dome of the blue sky will look into its closets, it will find its skeletons of crime, hideous to the eyes of man to behold, and these skeletons, praise God, are as few and as far between in North Carolina and her sister Southern States as in any other within the jurisdiction of this House.

Why should we not be able as lawmakers, as leaders of thought, and as men commanding the respect and confidence of an intelligent constituency, sent here to lead the Nation, not into error but out of it; sent here to open the way to truths and to the realizations of a higher and stronger national life and the realizations of lofty and noble aspirations—why should we not be able to see and understand this thing in the full sweep of its application and the fullness of its real philosophy? Why do we not all admit the causes of it and meet each other as brothers rather than as foes? We will if we approach it with more sympathy and less politics and sectionalism and less egotism. First understand the cause of lynching and be certain we understand it, and approach it with consideration for the views of your equals better able than you to understand it and handle it. The burden of our differences will then roll away. The lyncher is, in most instances, far from the lower order of criminals many men think him to be.

Lynching does not grow out of infringements upon property rights with such frequency as to excite your emphatic protest here indicated. They grow out of exciting outrages to personal rights. A delicate, cultured, popular woman, commanding the affection of a large community, is outraged. Masculine impulses are excitable. They sweep up like the flame of Dido's love. They embrace womanhood as the vine embraces the trunk. Chivalry is the keynote to that structure which their social culture has engendered. Womanhood is weak, gentle, appealing, and full of love, and stretches out its arms to man for protection and vindication. Virtue is the spark that catches its light and inspiration from the immortal God and leaves at an immeasurable distance below all other qualities and sensibilities. Away back in the rural districts, where no policemen are and where loneliness and quiet reign, as the day draws near its close and active life is tired—the customary hour for the crime against womanhood—the horror breaks on this quiet with the stealth of the serpent as he crawled on his belly to carry sin into the Garden of Eden. The deed is accomplished; the crime is committed; a home is ruined. A farm bell rings. Is it a fire? Is it a sudden death? What is the matter? The phones, if any, are active. As upon the lightning wings of electricity the signal of horror fills the air, and from the four corners excited manhood rushes to the scene. In the adjacent woods the culprit is found. Are these men criminals or are they simply made in the mold and with the qualities of character that God created for noble purposes, subjected to a test that human character can not stand? They ought to take the culprit to jail and give him a judicial trial, but I have too much respect for you to make you answer would you do it, if the unfortunate victim was near and dear to you. If you say I put an extraordinary case, I answer I have a right to put one if reasonably calculated to arise and become subject to your bill.

Put a milder case in just such a community: A man whose life has endeared him to his neighbors, their leader and preceptor in thought and action, is murdered without cause. Is the test upon judicial character and human equilibrium much less severe? But turning away from the personal side to the official. What about the sheriff's duties? Is he ubiquitous? When these outraged men, without cooling time, besiege the jail, can he overcome their physical strength? What can the governor do? What can the judge do? What can the local magistrate do? These are the officers of the State; these are the men and the officials through whose conduct you measure and adjudge the attitude of the State toward this culprit.

You have reached an absurd conclusion and you can not remedy these conditions by coercive measures and by putting upon the statute books laws that aim to subdue and that insult and defy rather than persuade and appease passion with weapons of violence. Men can not be governed that way. Centuries of political education are behind this generation of American citizens. This education has taught them that governments were adopted to prevent wrongs in the first instance and not to create one wrong to cure another. Governments can not arm themselves with bludgeons and march out among the people and slay their institutions as Sampson slew his enemies in primitive and heathen times. You are attempting the impossible when you say, as you do by sections 4 and 5, that a county shall be practically destroyed, its property sold, its tax burdens piled up on the shoulders of its cultured, law-abiding citizenship as a penalty for the crimes of which it had no preventive power. You are not only doing an injustice so grievous that it cries to heaven, but you are doing all that is possible to develop a spirit of resentment in the better qualities of character, the tendency of which is nothing better than to make lawbreakers and government haters out of men who are naturally patriots. And, most unfortunately, it is as certain as ever a proposition can be made that the enactment of this law would be followed by a spirit of resentment in the bosom of white people, among whom Negroes live and have their being, that would create a hostility and race prejudice that would do inestimable harm and tend to check the spirit of peace and personal respect and consideration that is growing stronger instead of weaker between them. Besides, it is certain that the criminal class, feeling by this law that the Government was their defender and protector, would be rather encouraged than restrained and our race problem greatly complicated rather than helped.

I can not conceive of a greater outrage upon the fundamental principles of this Government than to say by a law of Congress in a State whose executive, legislative, and judicial branches of government have devoted their best energies to the prevention of lynching, whose pulpit and press and bar and all other educational institutions have exercised themselves day and night to the cultivation of a better and a higher state of public sentiment, that a county shall have its almshouse sold, or, so far as I am a lawyer and able to judge from the language of section 5 of this bill, its courthouse and jail sold, or, in lieu of that, a debt of $10,000 added by the mandate of a Federal court to the burden of taxation under which its people groan, for the remuneration of the wife or children of a heartless criminal and brute who has excited the sensibilities and impulses of its people to the point that they have gone too far and taken the law into their own hands and whose life, if it could be restored, would not be worth in dollars and cents enough to pay for the coffin in which his body is buried. I say I can not think of a suggestion more abhorrently unwise and unjust. The crudest intellect that ever roamed the primeval forests of this continent with scalping knife and tomahawk would seem to me to have sufficient conception of right and wrong to appreciate its injustice and sufficient ideas of government to see its unwisdom, and if this language is too strong it at least has the virtue of honesty.

Somebody is simply mad; some cause, abnormal and dangerous, is behind this suggestion. It is easy to see, and it has no semblance of moral or political rectitude. The cause lies in the pivotal States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri. Consult the World Almanac and the cause becomes clear. Their electoral votes determine the election of a President, and the Negro vote holds the balance of power, and it must be truckled to, cajoled, and appeased. It is unnecessary to that end. The Negro must vote, and can not but vote the Republican ticket, and his threats and complainings are empty and void as expressions of rebellion from that party. For such unwholesome reasons, so unnecessary even to partisan politics, it is grievously unfortunate to contemplate the popular body of the National Congress thus insulting a group of States of 20,000,000 of people. Their righteous resentment and the finest conscience of a whole Nation will denounce it and consign it to the urn which history reserves for its records of infamy.

Mr. Chairman, with profound pride and with sentiments of personal affection for his memory, I close with a quotation from North Carolina's late beloved ex-Gov. Bickett, who passed from scenes of this character to those of more profound wisdom and clearer, stronger conscience only a few weeks ago. From a newspaper of his State, paying tribute to his memory a few days after his death, I clip the following:

HAMPTON, VA., April 15.

Thomas W. Bickett, former governor of North Carolina, declared today at the fifty-third anniversary celebration of Hampton Institute that "the Negro is entitled to equal and exact justice before the law and the white man must accord him that justice or be false to all those traditions that have made the Anglo-Saxon race the glory of the world." The one safe path for the Negro to follow is the path that leads straight to the door of the white man's conscience.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] such time as he may require.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, this is no ordinary bill. It is a most alarmingly extraordinary one. As an example of misgovernment, its enactment would out-Herod Herod by outlawing the States and outraging the Constitution of the United States. Such is the admonition that comes to this House, not only from the South but also from "way down East" in rock-ribbed Maine and from "way out West" in rugged Nebraska.

This measure is in utter disregard of the wisdom and the warning of the fathers who set for this Union the limitations that mark the boundaries of its governmental safety. It proposes an unwarranted incursion into State sovereignty. And for what purpose, pray? This is the answer: In order to coerce the States for the mere sake of supposed political expediency. And the situation is all the more lamentable when we contemplate at whose demand it is being done.

Those who are opposing this measure are really trying to bring about the result for which this bill is ostensibly drawn. It has been brought to the attention of the House repeatedly during this debate that we of the South deplore lynching and do not defend it; but, like the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY], we realize that the cure for the evils which exist is to come from the development of a more wholesome public sentiment, among both whites and blacks, rather than from the encouragement by the Federal Government of those who would commit crimes so suggestive and provocative of lynching. The constant growth of that salutary public opinion has been manifesting its efficacy in a great reduction in the number of lynchings from year to year.

The present need is for more of cooperation and less of agitation, more of progressive practice and less of political preaching.

The situation is aggravated rather than relieved by sending professional agitators to sow the wind in the southern sections of our land. The lesson that the colored people need to learn—to decry and suppress lawlessness within their own ranks and to take the necessary steps to stop it and to see that it is properly punished when it does occur—is one entirely different from that which such agents are teaching. In contemplation of what is likely to follow, gentlemen, if this bill be enacted into law, certainly it may be better for a time to bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of except as unfortunate race conflicts in some of the northern sections of our country have hinted at their horrors.

The lack of constitutional warrant for this measure has been so clearly and so convincingly presented that I wish in the very brief time at my disposal to suggest one or two of the practical effects of its enactment. I do not know just how the sum of $10,000 was arrived at as a proper figure to be inserted in section 5, but its incorporation there brings to my mind a possible analogy which I wish to call to your attention. Assuming this dangerous bill to be the law of the land, I think I can illustrate the idea best by reciting the probable experience of two women, typical of classes, who come and knock for aid at the door of the Federal Government.

The first is Mrs. White. Let us consider her case. Here she is at the district office of the Veterans' Bureau, and she calls for the district manager. Her visit concerns a recent death. Somewhat after this fashion she tells her simple story: "Sir, a few years ago, when our Nation entered the great World War, my husband answered the call of his country to arms. It was a real sacrifice for him to go, for he loved his wife and children very dearly, but he felt that it was his duty to us, to his country, and to his God. I wanted to do my part and I gave my consent. He fought bravely over there, as the records will show. A short time ago he died, and the little ones and I are left to struggle on without him." And then, through her sad recital, there beams a ray of hope as she continues: "But I find that he took out an insurance policy with the Federal Government for $10,000, and I have come to learn just how I can collect the money."

The district manager makes the necessary investigation of the case, and after a time this is the report he gives her: "Mrs. White, I am sorry to have to tell you just what the situation is; sorry for you and for your children. It is true your husband was a brave soldier and that he took out a policy with the Federal Government for $10,000, but, unfortunately, after meeting many of his premiums promptly, he failed in some way to pay the one last due before his death, and thereby his insurance lapsed." Then out of the depth of her sorrow she pleads: "Oh, sir, but he fought so manfully for his country, and the children and I sacrificed so much and economized so closely in order that he might go and do his duty, and we are in such need of the insurance." Then the district manager explains to her that insurance is a business; that its successful operation requires the application of business methods; that even the Federal Government can not abrogate and override the fundamental principles upon which it is established; and that even in such a worthy case as her own the Federal Government can not take $10,000 from the people and place that sum in her needy hands. And Mrs. White, though she goes on her way sorrowfully and without the $10,000 for which she had hoped, is nevertheless reconciled, for she says to herself, consolingly: "It is hard, but I understand it. My husband struggled and suffered for what is best for this country, and so must I. It's our country, and we love it and must sacrifice for it."

Now, let us consider the case of the second woman, Mrs. Black. Here she is at the office of the United States district attorney. Her visit concerns a recent death. Somewhat after this fashion she tells her simple story: "Mr. District Attorney, I'm Mrs. Black. The Federal Government owes me $10,000, and I have come to learn just how I can collect the money." Not understanding at first the exact nature of her mission, the district attorney inquires: "How does the Federal Government owe you $10,000?" And she replies: "Don't you remember? Why, my husband was the one that raped Mrs. White's little girl, and the folks over in that neighborhood caught him and killed him."

This statement refreshes the district attorney's memory and he corrects her erroneous impression of the matter. "The Federal Government doesn't owe you this money," he says. "It's this way: The Federal Government forces the people of this county to pay $10,000, and that sum is placed in your hands." At the same time the mind of the district attorney is probably thinking also that the Federal Government comes into the State and abrogates and overrides the fundamental principles upon which the Federal Constitution is established. She can not quite understand, so she asks further: "Don't I have to pay some kind of premium or something to get the $10,000?" The district attorney, in duty bound, explains to her that she does not, and that the Federal Government places upon him the burden of getting the money for her and her children without any premium of any character.

Finally she goes on her way joyfully with the $10,000 for which she had never hoped, and as she contemplates the way she used to support her departed spouse she says to herself, gleefully: "This is easy. I can't quite understand it. I just know that I have $10,000 of other people's money and that my suffering and struggles and sacrifices are over, thanks to Mr. DYER, of Missouri, and those who voted for his bill."

The effort to convince those who are familiar with the existing conditions in the South that the terms of this measure provide the proper method of solving this problem is very much on a par, gentlemen, with undertaking to prove to them that black is white.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. YATES]. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I believe that this committee ought to report this bill out to the House of Representatives, with the recommendation "that the bill do pass."

I believe it is a good bill and that it ought to pass.

By my own action, I have deprived myself of all opportunity to make a real argument. The gentleman from Minnesota, Judge VOLSTEAD, the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, from which committee this bill comes, and to which committee I belong, was willing, several days ago to yield to me—or at least he suggested that I make an hour's argument. But, feeling that the time needed by others for argument would be more than the chairman could yield to them, I said I would be content with 15 minutes, which means at most about fifteen hundred words or 15 sentences. And now my chairman has no "hours" to give, and I find myself with 15 minutes, scarcely more than 15 sentences, to discuss the world, the flesh, and the devil, so wide a range does the discussion threaten to take, although the real subject is that most satanic thing, mob murder.

Under such limitation it would be idle and unwise to attempt a connected, sustained, and logical argument.

All I can do is to fix your attention to a few things which, because of their intensity, challenge notice—challenge the notice of you all.

I remark in the first place, that the question raised by the bill is simply whether we shall give up the American experiment of self-government and at intervals yield to government by the mob.

For myself, I see no reason whatever to alter or change a thing I said myself at Springfield, Ill., from the governor's office on the 6th day of September, 1903, namely:

> If a hundred or a thousand men, infuriated and inflamed by passion or prejudice or intoxication (or from any other cause), shall be allowed to use the power to say whether you or I or any other citizen shall live or die, then there is—and can be—no safety, no peace, and no liberty; and in that case all the efforts of all the men and women of all the past who have struggled and fought and died for liberty have been in vain.
> GOV. YATES AND MOB LAW.
> [From the Philadelphia Press.]
> Gov. Yates, of Illinois, has taken his stand with Gov. Durbin, whom President Roosevelt justly and vigorously praises, in denouncing mob law and in beginning proceedings against lynchers. Last Thursday he sent a letter to the sheriff of each of the counties in Illinois in which there has been a lynching or an attempt at lynching, pointing out the duties of a sheriff in maintaining law and order and calling for vigorous action in the prosecution of everyone who tries to execute mob law.
> In his letter to Sheriff Whitlock, of Danville, whose brave and successful defense of a colored prisoner from a mob was recorded a few days ago, Gov. Yates says:
> "If a hundred or a thousand men, infuriated and inflamed by passion or prejudice, or intoxicated, or through any other cause, shall be allowed to use the power to say whether you or I or any other citizen shall live or die, then there is and can be no safety, no peace, and no liberty, and in that case all the efforts of all the men of all the past who have struggled and fought and died for liberty have been in vain."
> That contains the pith of the whole question of mob rule. If the due process of the courts is to be superseded by any body of men who may choose to take the execution of the law into its own hands, then no man's life is safe, and order and civilization have come to an end. There is no other alternative.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YATES. I am very sorry, indeed, that I can not yield. I would not be discourteous for the world, but it is impossible for me to yield in the limited time I have.

I can see nothing in the above statement to apologize for and I do not apologize. I see nothing whatever in the above statement but what every true southerner, every forward-looking, upstanding, law-loving son of the South, or the North, or East, or West can truly subscribe to.

The statement is, in substance, subscribed to by every man of my name that I know of; and there are hundreds of my name scattered all over the South, for I am of Southern descent—full of Southern blood.

Both of my parents were born in Kentucky; my mother at the "Hub" of the "Blue Grass," Lexington. All my grandparents were born in Virginia, the blessed Old Dominion, in "Old Caroline County," near Bowling Green, and to use the language of my grandfather, Henry Yates, "In the fo'ks of the Mattaponi, sah, in the forks of the Mattaponi."

And my grandfather's grandfather, old Dr. Michael Yates, a surgeon of the Revolution, lived near Guinea Bridge, near the little house where, 60 years afterwards (now 60 years ago), Stonewall Jackson breathed his last.

This ancestor of mine, surgeon of the Revolution, while so Irish that "nobody trod on the tail of his coat," was an Irish Virginian, a Virginia Irishman—some combination.

My Virginia grandfather, Henry Yates, put his young bride on the pillion behind him and rode through the Cumberland Gap, horseback, into Kentucky, when Kentucky was the "dark and bloody ground," head erect, eye alight, soul aloft, afraid of neither God, man, nor devil—well, just afraid of God, not of any thing that walks this old world of ours.

By way of parenthesis, permit me to inquire, Do you think that type of man, and there were a million like him, would temporize with a mob—would be afraid of a cowardly mob?

There are many things about him that I am proud of, but there is nothing that I am more proud of than the inscription he put on the tombstone at the head of the grave of his wife the day before he left Kentucky to go and live in Illinois.

In a little tiny graveyard, at the southern edge of a vast field, which field slopes southward, down to a little rivulet, beyond whose semicircular meandering rises hill on hill, a magnificent amphitheater of the beloved "Green hills of Kentucky," I found, a number of years ago, on a simple slab this inscription:

> Sacred to the memory of Milicent Yates, wife of Henry Yates, justice of the peace of Kentucky.

I hope you "get it" in all its fullness. Justice of the peace of Kentucky. Proud to be an officer of the law—proud to hold a commission from the law—proud to preside in beloved Kentucky over that court which in all States is the people's court. Proud, yes; proud to be connected with the enforcement of the peace. And proud, yes; proud to be for law and order.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in beginning in this way I have given you my speech; in beginning this way have plunged in medias res, into the heart of this subject.

This bill is a good bill and ought to pass, because it is a bill for law and order—for order against disorder, for law against lawlessness.

It is not a bill for or against the South or any section; it is not a bill for or against the white man or any other color; it is a bill to enthrone order and to dethrone disorder. It is not a bill to encourage a certain crime—that is, rape—although so called by the Member from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. For every rapist murdered by a mob four others are murdered by the mob. I have gotten through swallowing the major premise, when that major premise is presented by the other side. I used to admit, "O, yes, the moon is made of green cheese," but I do not any more. I decline to be side-tracked into a discussion of whether we are injuring some State by interfering with a fixed and established institution whose barbarity is justified by its fiendishness.

That is not the question. The question is, Shall we have mob law and violence—government by mob—in this country, for which the great Washington fought and for which the great Lincoln died, and the glory of which—yes; the honor and power and progress of which—was and is enshrined in the souls of a hundred million American women whose graves lie out to-night "under the stars and the dew waiting the judgment day"?

I remark in the second place that we ought fully to comprehend the nature of the mob. It is the mob we are after; the thing, the awful thing, facing us and flaunting us is this thing—the mob.

It is a thing of hate.

It is devilish, diabolical, satanic.

It is straight from hell.

It is halted by no injustice—

Says a lawyer from Georgia, before the American Bar Association, assembled in national convention at Cincinnati, September 2, 1921—

> It is halted by no injustice, no cruelty, no brutality; it is deaf to the voice of reason, mercy, and humanity; it is a besom of destruction. Such is the mob major.
> Maddened by lust, plunder, passion, hunger, hatred, personal revenge, whose madness is superinduced by its own real or imaginary wrongs, by its own real or imaginary interests or gratification.

Such in the phrases of this eminent lawyer is the "mob major." And then he comes to the lynching mob.

> Noteworthy among the mob species is the lynching mob. It might justly be called the objective mob.
> Lynching is defined by Repalje and Lawrence as mob vengeance upon persons suspected of crime. Both Worcester and Webster define it as the infliction of punishment without legal trial or by unauthorized persons.

He continues and concludes:

> No matter what may be said in explanation, nothing can be said in extenuation of lynching. It is an inexcusable and pernicious part of the mob spirit that is so constantly and industriously laying the ax at the root of this Government.
> All parties ought to seek its destruction by persuasion, by teaching, and last, but not least, by the terrors of the law. But the doing so ought not to be made the occasion or the excuse to extenuate or conceal the mighty, deadly germs of which lynching is only one of the species.

Luther Z. Rosser, of Atlanta, gives us these words.

Let us stop and think. Think of it well. This Government of ours, for which a million men have died in America, plus the 100,000 more who died in 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921; this Government for which a hundred million women have agonized, this Government, heir of the ages, child of the centuries, beacon light of liberty, the last hope of humanity; this Government and country, for whom no king, no emperor, no sultan, no czar; and no mikado is praying to-day or to-night or at any time. We have got to take care of ourselves; this Nation which no armed nation on earth can whip or conquer (no wonder they all scream "disarm") may yet be menaced and possibly overthrown or crippled by mob spirit. God forbid. I do not believe it is possible; but I do believe that unless we put down and keep down mob spirit it will cut gashes at the very root.

I remark in the third place, that here, right here, is the chief reason for this bill, its reason for existence; a reason which actually clamors for its passage. Mob spirit strikes at all government, and legislation concerning it is not and can not be in this day and generation peculiar to any one section of the land. This bill is not an imputation on one section of our united country, namely, the South. It may be so construed by some men too sensitive. It may affect temporarily that section more than another. But mob law has entered other States, many States, almost all States. It has entered my State of Illinois; has appeared there in Chicago, in East St. Louis, and in Springfield since 1905, and in the time before that, when I was chief executive of Illinois, it appeared at Danville, Ill., and in six other localities. And on seven occasions when I was governor I was compelled to call out troops, four times to prevent lynching, three times to put an end to riots.

In Illinois we realize that mob violence is a menace every day; and we are on the watch for it now.

Our laws punish the participant in a mob, punish the man who during a riot or in a mob inflicts damages upon person or property—make him pay up to $5,000—and punish the city or county where a mob operates, compelling the community to pay up to $5,000 to the surviving spouse of any person lynched.

At least one county has lately paid heavily in damages, and I think three have.

Our good and decent people have not thus far resented this—do not call it an imputation.

And our law authorizes our governor to summarily remove a cowardly or shirking sheriff; it is no longer any fun, no longer a good joke, in our State at least, for a sheriff or officer having a prisoner in custody to look the other way.

The Revised Statutes, Illinois Criminal Code, chapter 38, paragraph 256x, section 6, of "An act to suppress mob violence," in force July 1, 1905, contain this:

> If any person shall be taken from the hands of a sheriff or his deputy having such person in custody and shall be lynched, it shall be prima facie evidence of failure on the part of such sheriff to do his duty, and upon the fact being made to appear to the governor, he shall publish proclamation declaring the office of such sheriff vacant and his office shall thereby and thereafter be immediately vacated.

Our people approve this law, too; it was thought that perhaps it would not be enforced, but it has been enforced.

Illinois will not tolerate mob violence if it can help it. It is highly resolved to put it down. Illinois will eventually stamp it out, root and branch.

And the great Government of the United States and the great Congress of the United States can do no more righteous work, and no more vital work for our children and our children's children than to stamp this monster, this brutality, this demon into the earth.

We have reached, once again in American history, the condition of 1837.

Abraham Lincoln, in an address at Springfield, January 27, 1837, moved thereto, by tragedies in Mississippi and Missouri, said of mobs and their atrocities:

> Accounts of outrages committed by mobs form the everyday news of the times. They have pervaded the country from New England to Louisiana; they are neither peculiar to the eternal snows of the former nor the burning sands of the latter; they are not the creature of climate, neither are they confined to the slaveholding or the nonslaveholding States. Alike, they spring up among the pleasure-hunting masters of southern slaves and the order-loving citizens of the land of steady habits. Whatever, then, the cause may be, it is common to the whole country.

Believing, as I do, that this question to-day is not, as I have already said, a southern question any more than it is a northern question or western question, and not any more a Negro question than it is a yellow or brown question or an olive-colored one, I regard this the present situation, when compared with and checked by Mr. Lincoln's statement, as history repeating itself. O you men of the South, why not take the same temperate and impartial view of the situation that Mr. Lincoln took, and that I hope I am taking—and just support this bill? Why are we to always meet, until the ultimate passage of this or a more stringent bill, with the accusation that we are aiming blows at the South and inflaming the South black and white? Are you still afraid of Negro domination, that old specter which makes you vote for a Democrat for President because you do not want a Negro constable?

I remark, in the fourth place, that it is alleged that the Constitution is again in terrible danger—that it is almost cracked again.

I am not as much alarmed as I might have been. When the prohibition bill was here on its passage it was alleged to be in conflict with the Constitution; opposed to that charter and palladium of our liberties; but the Supreme Court said it was not; said it was constitutional. When the income tax came along it appeared unconstitutional, but finally entirely constitutional was it held. In the old days, when John Sherman said, "The way to resume is to resume," some men cried "unconstitutional." And in still greater days, when our old friend, the paper dollar—the new national currency—was proposed under Chase, it was "unconstitutional."

And even when Abraham Lincoln, now revered by all Americans and by all men, used measure after measure to put down the rebellion, "unconstitutional" was the cry.

Oh, is it not time to get a new slogan, a new rallying cry, a new war cry? Will there never be a new one?

"Oh, captain, give us a new star to steer by, for I've got by that there north star," was the sailor's cry once upon a time. Just as even the north star may get tiresome, so the term "unconstitutional" may be too old some day, but it remains, up to date, the slogan of Democracy. A smoke screen; a sham battle; a rolling barrage; a gas attack.

It is noticeable that the "unconstitutional" slogan comes mainly from the gentleman from Texas; the leader from Tennessee spends only a few words on the crack in the Constitution.

I remark, in the fifth place, that the political minority in this House has decided to infuriate its units throughout the land by making this a question of "party."

It is not a question of "party." No question of majority or minority politics is involved, or even remotely related. Not a vote can be gained by the Republicans by the passage of this bill. On the contrary, we may lose at the election next November several seats in this House by this measure.

But, unwise as it may be for the Republican Party to denounce and punish lynching when "votes" are considered, it is infinitely more unwise for the Democraic Party to oppose legislation to end this cowardly, contemptible blot on our civilization. And I predict that for every seat in this House lost by Republicans for supporting this bill the Democrats will lose two for opposing it. In my own State every candidate seeking election to this House next November who dares to strengthen this hideous thing—mob violence—will be swept into oblivion as if by the thunderbolt of the Almighty. Let us not mince matters. Were I a leader of the minority I would hesitate long before I would parade and present to the country and to the world the great Democratic Party of Jefferson, of Jackson, of Cleveland, and of Wilson as the organized, filibustering opponent of a measure intended to outlaw and to punish every individual and every community supporting a mob, and to stamp down and out this mean, un-American evil.

Temporizing with violence is not Democratic doctrine. Grover Cleveland, great Democrat, filled Chicago in 1894 with men and guns, infantry, cavalry, and artillery, and brought the terrors of the law to the aid of that city, where the pestilence was walking in darkness and the destruction was wasting at noonday; and he, Grover Cleveland, put the "fear of God" into the mob that howled like wolves, and murdered like beasts, and looted like pirates, and tried to put great Chicago to the torch when they thought there was no help. That mob counted without Cleveland, but he was there, he and "Uncle Sam."

And Woodrow Wilson, great Democrat, would have done the same; you all know it; and President Wilson—unchallenged leader of latter-day Democrats—among his many good sayings incorporated one to the effect that mob violence is a disgrace and a shame. On July 16, 1918, he said, in a memorable appeal:

> MY FELLOW COUNTRYMEN: I take the liberty of addressing you upon a subject which so vitally affects the honor of the Nation and the very character and integrity of our institutions that I trust you will think me justified in speaking very plainly about it.
> I allude to the mob spirit which has recently here and there very frequently shown its head amongst us, not in any single region but in many and widely separated parts of the country. There have been many lynchings, and every one of them has been a blow at the heart of ordered law and humane justice. No man who loves America, no man who really cares for her fame and honor and character, or who is truly loyal to her institutions, can justify mob action while the courts of justice are open and the Governments of the States and the Nation are ready and able to do their duty. We are at this very moment fighting lawless passion. Germany has outlawed herself among the nations because she has disregarded the sacred obligations of law and has made lynchers of her armies. Lynchers emulate her disgraceful example. I for my part am anxious to see every community in America rise above that level with pride and a fixed resolution which no man or set of men can afford to despise.
> We proudly claim to be the champions of democracy. If we really are, in deed and truth, let us see to it that we do not discredit our own. I say plainly that every American who takes part in the action of a mob or gives it any sort of countenace is no true son of this great democracy but its betrayer, and does more to discredit her by that single disloyalty to her standards of law and of right than the words of her statesmen or the sacrifices of her heroic boys in the trenches can do to make suffering peoples believe her to be their savior. How shall we commend democracy to the acceptance of other peoples if we disgrace our own by proving that it is, after all, no protection to the weak? Every mob contributes to German lies about the United States what her most gifted liars can not improve upon by the way of calumny. They can at least say that such things can not happen in Germany except in times of revolution when law is swept away.

I therefore very earnestly and solemnly beg that the governors of all the States, the law officers of every community, and, above all, the men and women of every community in the United States, all who revere America and wish to keep her name without stain or reproach, will cooperate—not passively merely but actively and watchfully—to make an end of this disgraceful evil. It can not live where the community does not countenance it.

I have called upon the Nation to put its great energy into this war and it has responded; responded with a spirit and a genius for action that has thrilled the world. I now call upon it, upon its men and women everywhere, to see to it that its laws are kept inviolate, its fame untarnished. Let us show our utter contempt for the things that have made this war hideous among the wars of history by showing how those who love liberty and right and justice and are willing to lay down their lives for them upon foreign fields stand ready also to illustrate to all mankind their loyalty to the things at home which they wish to see established everywhere as a blessing and protection to the peoples who have never known the privileges of liberty and self-government. I can never accept any man as a champion of liberty either for ourselves or for the world who does not reverence and obey the laws of our own beloved land, whose laws we ourselves have made. He has adopted the standards of the enemies of his country, whom he affects to despise.

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, it is rather strange for a Republican to be supporting Woodrow Wilson.

Mr. YATES. Oh, I told you some time ago that I was not sent here by the people of Illinois to abuse Woodrow Wilson, or anybody else. When he is right I am for him.

Democratic leaders here to-day are bringing their blood upon their own heads in filibustering here hour after hour, day after day, and in whipping into line almost every man, in opposing a law designed to end that horror—lynching.

Make no mistake; be not deceived; this Nation is not for the mob, will not tolerate the mob; witness Massachusetts, where, in supporting Calvin Coolidge, a hundred thousand Democrats served notice that America will stand no nonsense from the dark sinister legions of disorder. Calvin Coolidge, in 1919, when Governor of Massachusetts, said in a proclamation:

In the deliberate intention to intimidate and coerce the Government of this Commonwealth, a large number of policemen, urging all others to join them, deserted their posts of duty, letting in the enemy.

Notice the phrase "letting in the enemy." Mark it well! He who encourages mob law does let in our most awful enemy—Anarchy.

He continued:

There is an obligation, inescapable, to resist all those who do not support the Government. * * * There is no middle ground. * * * I call on every citizen to stand by me in executing the oath of my office.

And "the ancient faith" was justified; Massachusetts did stand by him; and the Vice Presidency was presented to him by a grateful Nation.

This Nation will stamp out mob violence, root and branch, when it gets started, and it is getting started.

Let us have no fears for the Republic because we curb disorder.

In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea;
Our hearts, our hopes are all with Thee.

But while the Republic is and will be safe, let us tremble for ourselves and our children when we remember "God is just."

O you men of the South, why, O why, can you not join us—just join us—in this law and all other things we try to do to help this situation? Why do you fan into flame every little smoldering fire of race hatred, as you do when you act as you are acting here to-day? [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I concur with the gentleman who has just concluded his remarks in his reprobation of lynching, for I believe that it is the opprobium of our civilization, which casts its deepest shadow upon us of the South. However, it may not be improper to observe that my own constituency knows how steadfastly I have stood for law and order and against lynching, not only in my own district but for the State at large. [Applause.] I am happy in believing that that conviction is also thoroughly shared by the Negro people of Virginia.

But that is aside the question. We can not fairly consider this bill by classing those opposed to it as favoring or in sympathy with lawlessness, disorder, and lynching. We can not dispose of this measure by the somewhat irrelevant consideration of what the eminent gentleman from Ohio calls the gravity of the situation. If gravity exists, and it does, the remedy is not an invalid bill, not in legislative usurpation, but in amendment of the Constitution. [Applause.]

First, give the representatives of the people the constitutional right, the constitutional authorization to consider this bill. Do not ask that we ravish the supreme law to enact an unconstitutional statute.

Gentlemen of the committee, when Members are called to the bar of the House to be sworn in office they are not sworn to support the Government of the United States, they are sworn to support and defend the Constitution of the United States and all laws made in pursuance thereof. Not the Government of Nation or State, but the Constitution prescribing the maintenance of indestructible States of an indissoluble Union.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] said that the constitutionality of some portions of this bill was doubtful, and the gentleman from Indiana rather concurred in this position. Therefore I venture to submit that to doubt the constitutionality of a bill imposes the moral obligation to vote against the bill. [Applause.] Representatives should not, morally they can not, vote for a bill the constitutionality of which they doubt. The benefit of the doubt must be given in favor of the Constitution.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If only a question.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman hold that if there is any doubt of the constitutionality of a proposition that we should not at least investigate the matter to determine as to its constitutionality?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Oh, no; we may investigate its constitutionality, but if there is a doubt as to its validity upon investigation we have no right to support it under our obligation.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the gentleman mean that it must be made certain beyond a reasonable doubt?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I would not put it in the form of a criminal trial.

Mr. HERSEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HERSEY. I gathered from the remarks of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] in his answer to the questions asked him that the proponents of this bill practically admit this morning that all its provisions are unconstitutional, except the one that applies to the obligation of the sheriff to protect the prisoner.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman. I wish next to observe that the opinion most relied on in this debate is that of the Attorney General of the United States, and that this opinion is not his opinion but only his concurrence in or adoption of the opinion of the Assistant Attorney General, and the Assistant Attorney General substantialy admitted in the hearings that he entertained doubts as to the constitutionality of the bill, but he wished or hoped to secure its validity by first procuring congressional enactment, believing by argument that once having the measure passed into the form of law the Supreme Court would give to Congress the benefit of the doubt and thus indirectly relieve us of our obligations to secure valid law.

It might not be constitutional before passage, but it would be after passage. This line of reasoning or suggestion is not sound. These opinions obviously lack the personal detachment primarily essential to judicial arguments.

I do not propose to discuss all the phases of the bill. I take it that no lawyer in this body, removed from partisan prejudice, which is sometimes unknown to its possessor, will contend that the bill is constitutional as respects any of its provisions, save the one in relation to sheriffs or ministerial officers. Surely no one can contend successfully that this bill is valid in its application to the acts of individuals or of counties. If anyone has any doubt on that, I ask him to read carefully the argument of the distinguished member of the committee from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] made a few days ago.

Mr. Chairman, when the fourteenth amendment was considered an amendment was offered to do just what the proponents of this bill now desire to do. In the heat and passion of the aftermath of a great war an amendment was submitted to and rejected by Congress, an amendment which undertook to confer upon the Congress the power to pass a bill similar to the bill now under consideration. I read that proposed amendment:

Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, and to all persons in the several States equal protection of the right of life, liberty, and property.

This proposed amendment was intended and did give to Congress the affirmative power which this bill is intended to employ. That was defeated. Of course that action is not conclusive interpretation, but it is so nearly conclusive in the light of all the circumstances that it amounts to an irrefutable argument.

When we compare the fourteenth amendment with the rejected amendment, we see the latter to be affirmative and positive in character, while the former is negative and corrective in character. Mr. John Randolph Tucker, one of the ablest men ever upon the Judiciary Committee of this House and some time chairman of that committee, uses this language in respect to the comparison:

The above-named proposed amendment gave Congress the power by affirmative legislation to do these things, while the amendment as adopted gave to Congress only the power to negative the action of a State abridging or denying these privileges.

And the Supreme Court by a long line of decisions has held and expounded this interpretation and this construction. This court has held that the power of Congress under the fourteenth amendment is a negative power, a corrective power, and if such is the construction as to the entire amendment, how much stronger is it applicable to the particular words of the amendment upon which this bill is specifically predicated? For I direct the attention of the committee to the fact that this bill is not predicated upon the entire fourteenth amendment, but only upon that language forbidding a State to deny the equal protection of its laws.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If only for a question.

Mr. LITTLE. If the gentleman concedes that if the sheriff refuses to try to rescue a man from a mob, the United States marshal may arrest him——

Mr. MONTAGUE. But I do not concede that. I have not reached that provision of the bill as yet.

Mr. LITTLE. But if the gentleman does concede that——

Mr. MONTAGUE. I shall not concede that. That may shorten the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. LITTLE. The gentleman will permit me to ask a question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; if not too long.

Mr. LITTLE. If the United States marshal could arrest the sheriff for refusing to do his duty, do I understand that he could not rescue the prisoner from a mob and arrest them, but would have to permit them to go ahead and burn the prisoner?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have not discussed that phase of the question. I mean to be thoroughly courteous to the gentleman, for I have very high respect for him. I believe he is a very sincere and upright gentleman. I have suggested to this committee that this bill is not bottomed on anything in the Constitution except one clause of the fourteenth amendment. I ask you to follow me in that. It is not based upon due process of law, it is not based upon any other provision or sentence in the fourteenth amendment, except one, and that is the one in relation to the equal protection of the laws. Let me read the section of the bill:

SEC. 2. That if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage, such State shall by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State, and to the end that such protection as is guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by its Constitution may be secured it is provided—

In other words, this bill is predicated upon this specific provision of the amendment; the bill in terms so declares.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] brought out what is obvious to any lawyer that this bill by legislative fiat undertakes to define and declare what is a denial of equal protection of the laws. It declares that certain acts constitute a denial of the equal protection of the laws. I submit that must be a judicial and not a legislative finding. Such a declaration must result from the exercise of judicial power and not congressional power. This bill is predicated upon that definition, and the entire hearing is confined to that definition, namely, a denial of equal protection of the laws.

I do not controvert the statement or argument that if a State denies equal protection of the laws it is amenable to the inhibition of the fourteenth amendment, but the question at once arises: What is State action?

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. If it is along the line that I have in mind.

Mr. FESS. My question is whether we have the constitutional authority to legislate on this matter. It is my high appreciation of the gentleman's judgment that leads me to ask him the question. Suppose that the nationals of some foreign government with which we have a treaty, like Italy, should be mobbed in Ohio, has the Federal Government, which makes the treaty, no authority whatever to require the State to respect the items of the treaty?

Mr. MONTAGUE. That question I candidly say to the gentleman I would not answer now, because I may not be sufficiently prepared to make an answer, and it is not relevant to the phase of the subject I am now discussing.

Mr. HERSEY. It is provided in all treaties that foreign citizens shall be protected by the courts.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That is true, but there has been some question as to liability of the National Government by reason of the failure of State action.

Mr. FESS. Of course the gentleman knows to what I refer. I refer to the situation in Louisiana with reference to the Italians.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We have had such cases from time to time, and President Taft urged on Congress appropriate legislation, if I remember. But I do not care to go into that now, because that is not the phase of the question I am now discussing.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. And if the gentleman will permit, even if it were to be admitted that the Federal Government did have the power to deal with the murderers of nationals of other Government, it would not be on all fours with this proposition.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Not at all. That is a very different question. I am addressing myself now to the right of the National Government to administer the police laws of the States and to make crimes of certain acts or conduct of the citizens of the several States over and above and against their laws.

The unbroken decisions of the Supreme Court hold that police powers rest within the States; that such police powers are the reserved powers of the States, and this amendment has not taken such powers from the States. The gentleman from Ohio argued that the progress of economic and social forces, the development of science and inventions, are wiping away the lines of the States of our Union, and, therefore, that we, in obedience to this mechanical progress, in obedience to the inventive genius of man as applied to physical and economic forces, must yield, willingly or unwillingly, our spiritual and moral sense of obligation imposed by the Constitution so far as those obligations required us to determine what are the powers of the State and Nation, respectively. I repel this argument as offensive to reason, history, and morals. I believe with the great historian, Grote, that there is in the realm of ethics a mandate known as "constitutional morality." If this obligation in its application becomes unwise and inexpedient or unsafe, then we must meet the difficulty, not by judicial usurpation, not by legislative usurpation, but by constitutional amendment, as I have before suggested, thus unfettering our minds and consciences from our oaths to support the Constitution.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Does my colleague think, referring to the question put to him by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], that it would be competent for Congress, because of treaties that exist between this country and China and Japan, to legislate so that the Federal Government can go into the State of California and deal with matters that have been supposed to be within the police power of the State of California, ousting the jurisdiction of the State?

Mr. MONTAGUE. My views are that it would be incompetent for the Federal Government to exert such a power. But I am not arguing that phase of the question. I think when the Californians reach that question they will present their argument better than I.

Mr. BRAND. I wish to call attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has decided, under the facts of the case presented therein, which involved the rights of the States and the power of Congress to legislate thereon, that Congress could enact legislation which would be constitutional, but the opinion was based upon a treaty held to be valid. This may be found in Two-hundred and fifty-second United States, State of Missouri against Holland.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I started to observe that the State acts, as we all know—it is hornbook law—through its departments, namely, legislative, executive, and judicial. And there seems to be in the minds of some gentlemen a question as to the constitutionality of the provisions holding a State liable for the failure, negligence, inefficiency, or crime of the sheriff, constable, or prosecuting attorneys composing in part one of these departments of government. If a prosecuting attorney fails to prosecute with ability or efficiency, he becomes liable under this bill. I submit to the committee that no student of the American system ever dreamed that the Federal Government possesses that authority under this amendment to supervise the efficiency or fix the standards of ability of their prosecuting attorneys. If so, where is your authority in reason or in precedent. If Congress can do that, Congress can prescribe, by the same logic, punishment for the failure of a jury to convict or acquit one charged with crime. There is no logical obstruction to the march of the mind to such a conclusion.

The argument advanced here is that we do not hold the sheriff under this bill liable unless he neglects, refuses, or fails to do his duty. Now, I contend that to deny the equal protection of the laws by one of the departments of the State governments requires substantive and affirmative action on the part of the State or its authorized officers. The State must affirmatively refuse or deny the equal protection of the laws. The State must not enact discriminatory laws or enforce nondiscriminatory laws in a discriminatory manner. This I understand to be the general principle supported by a torrent of reason and authorities underlying the law. I maintain that action of a ministerial officer of a State, when unauthorized and in defiance of the law of the State, can not bind the State, and its action is not in contravention——

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Please do not interrupt me right now.

Mr. LITTLE. They have decided the other way in different cases.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think so.

Mr. LITTLE. They said they did.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think they said so.

I am fairly familiar with the Virginia case. The judge who declined to put Negroes upon the eligible list of jurors in Virginia maintained that he was carrying into effect the laws of that Commonwealth, and he represented the attitude of Virginia in that respect. He never contended for an instant he was violating the law, but that he was effectuating the law. And more, Virginia intervened in the proceedings in the Supreme Court, and supported the judge in his contention. I submit to you it is as plain as your hands before your face, so far as respects that case, that the judge was representing the Commonwealth of Virginia, and Virginia, so far as the record discloses and so far as the history of the case is concerned, through its attorney general and governor, approved of the action of the judge.

Moreover, the action of the judge discriminated against a large class of people by denying them the right to be eligible as jurors, thus bringing his action into direct conflict with the purpose and object of the fourteenth amendment as adjudicated by the Slaughterhouse cases, the Civil Rights cases, and a long line of deliverances of the Supreme Court. That this is the true construction of this case (Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S., 339) appears from the opinion and conclusion in Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313) wherein the judge was assailed as violating the Federal law in that he placed no Negro upon the panel, thus showing that he did not discriminate against a class of Negroes, and his position was upheld by the court.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; I will.

Mr. MANN. Suppose a sheriff with a man in his custody deliberately turns him over to a mob? I just wanted to know the opinion of the gentleman.

Mr. MONTAGUE. My view is this, that the State can not be bound by the criminal acts of its ministerial officers. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. In a moment.

When a sheriff turns the prisoner over to a mob, he aids and abets in murder, and his action can not bind the State; he defies the laws; he opposes the laws of the State. He does not represent, but misrepresents, the laws of the State. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. I was just about to suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that I think he has covered the point where the sheriff becomes the lawbreaker. Instead of acting in obedience to the State, or for the State, he is acting against the State.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman says that the State would not be held responsible for the action of its ministerial officers. With that view I am inclined to agree. But does the gentleman hold that a ministerial officer can not himself be punished under legislation enacted by the Federal Government under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly not. Obviously, a gentleman of the ability of my friend from New York will appreciate that such an act of the officer is a private, personal, act, and not an official act, and therefore the person is punishable by the laws of the State and not of the United States.

Mr. MANN. If the State selects as a sheriff a man who refuses to act under the law of the State, is not that the act of a State?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think not. I submit that his refusal to act is an act of disobedience to the State. It is a crime against the State. It is an unlawful and criminal refusal to do what the State commands him to do.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And he is removable from his office.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; as the gentleman from Michigan says, he is removable from his office for malfeasance, misfeasance, or crime.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. The State acts by its legislative, executive, and judicial authority. It can act in no other way. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or evade. The Supreme Court of the United States has said that it had.

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, the Supreme Court has said nothing of the kind.

Mr. LITTLE. It did. I am reading from it. I do not wish the gentleman to contradict me. This is from page 347 of Ex parte Virginia. I am quoting from the Supreme Court, and it contradicts the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Virginia yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. COCKRAN. When a State officer is violating the law of a State, he is acting against the State, and can not be acting for it?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. LITTLE. The Supreme Court has held otherwise. I can only read it to you. I can not make you understand it.

Mr. COCKRAN. The gentleman is mistaken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] has the floor.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. HERSEY. Section 2 of the bill says that "any State or municipal officer having charge of the prisoner," and so forth. That would be a constable of a city or a town?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; or a policeman.

Mr. HERSEY. Does he represent the State?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not think the Supreme Court will so hold, and I do not think it has heretofore so held.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It seems to be suggested on the other side, and it is apparently the spirit of the bill, that you can attribute to the State, and hold the State responsible for the malfeasance and misfeasance of any of its officials. If that is good doctrine, can we morally protect ourselves from holding the Government of the United States responsible for the misconduct of its officials? Congress has declined to do that up to this time, but if we are going to take this step we can not morally defend ourselves from taking the other step.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I am coming now to that. I submit that no sovereign is responsible for the torts of its officers. [Applause.]

No sovereign State, and such are the States of the American Union, is responsible for the torts of its officials. The State can not be sued in the courts for the negligence of its officials unless by constitutional or legislative authorization. All States are clothed with that protective power.

Now, gentlemen, if a State is not responsible for the torts of its officers, by what process of human reasoning can you make a State responsible for the criminal conduct of its officers?

Mr. CLOUSE. We hear no answer.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There is no logical or rational answer. If the premise is sound that a State is not liable for the torts of its officers, a fortiori is the State without liability for the crimes of its officials.

Mr. Chairman, I desired to deal with that phase of the subject, and I fear I have dealt with it inadequately. But may I submit one other reflection? I do not concede that the State which I have in part the honor to represent is embraced in what you call "the lynching States." I suppose that the record of Virginia in that respect compares favorably with that of most of the American States, with the State of our distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] or with the State of my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN], for example.

I know of no lynchings in Virginia for many years, except two, and these were accomplished before the authorities of the State could arrest or obtain custody of the criminals. I would also observe that in Virginia we have the honorable distinction of having arrested, convicted, and sentenced lynchers. The honorable Representative on this floor from the fifth Virginia district [Mr. HOOKER] was the prosecuting attorney in Virginia who, with a Virginia judge and jury, accomplished that achievement some years since. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have only the kindest feelings for the colored people of my State and of the South. I believe it the duty of government to go the length—aye, the full length—to protect the obscure and the ignorant and the weak; they deserve the protection of government more than the mighty and the wise or learned. But this great body should not run wild to enforce a law that, if possibly constitutional, may encounter a worse ending, namely, the destruction of our governmental system. It is a mistake to think that the States come from the Federal Government. The truth of history and the philosophy of our institutions is that the Federal Government comes from the States. [Applause.] It is true that we have whittled away, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] suggested this morning, the rights of the States. This may be the result of inexorable influences or the march of inevitable events; I know not; but it is not a part of statesmanship to facilitate that influence or stimulate that march. When we continue to centralize government in Washington, to augment and multiply its powers, with innumerable officeholders, and appalling costs, we will then have a huge, mighty, complex machine, clumsy in operation, consuming the substance of the people in cost of maintenance, and in its last analysis destructive of human liberty and human rights. [Applause.] I am no fanatic on the subject of State rights. I believe in a liberal exercise of the powers of the Constitution. I would if I could place myself in the company of John Marshall. I would first know that the power exists under this instrument, either expressed or implied; and if the power so exists, I would next know, Is the measure proposed essential to carry out the express or implied power?

We can not invert the structure of our Government. We can not turn the pyramid bottom up. We must strengthen and not weaken its foundation. The life, growth, and perpetuity of American institutions is the development and growth of the American communities, the American States. The law and order of America will, in its last analysis, find its support and its nourishing influences in the community by increasing the responsibility and appreciation of the citizenship of the community for its good name and for its law and order. When we undertake here to transfer the power of the Federal Government to the several States we will accomplish a blighting if not a fatal result, for we will impair and weaken and finally destroy the sense of responsibility of the law-abiding people of every community. [Applause.]

May I suggest an analogy which I imagine nobody will controvert? Irrespective of the merits or demerits of the amendment dealing with the liquor question, it is obvious to anyone who has observed the administration of the laws that many of the States, although possessing concurrent jurisdiction, have become lax in their duties and have put the burden of the administration and enforcement of that law upon the National Government. That will be the case in too many instances when the States omit their duty and permit the more wealthy but less efficient Government to bear their burdens. We need not deceive ourselves by thinking that the Federal officials have more patriotism, more intelligence, and more efficiency than the people of the several States. In my judgment there is hardly a State in the Union that is not administered more wisely, more efficiently, and more economically than the Government at Washington.

My own State has come up through mighty travail, suffering by the great conflict of States as much, if not more, than France suffered by the World War, yet mindful of her history, of her contributions to the genesis, the maintenance, and the development of our free institutions, and still her government is more economical, more efficient, and expeditious in administration than the National Government. And that, Mr. Chairman, is no reflection upon the National Government. That is an inexorable incident of enormous power exercised by officials far away from the sources of that power. Have not gentlemen on this floor proudly and properly instanced the competency of their States to meet and enforce their laws and police regulations? Why, therefore, should we absolve ourselves from the responsibilities of citizenship and bring here local administration, far away from the sources of these crimes, far away from the laws governing and punishing those crimes? Washington can not hear the voice or stimulate the responsibility of the communities most deeply interested and most concretely affected.

Therefore, gentlemen of the committee, I beg to say in conclusion that my opposition to this bill is largely of a constitutional character. Oh, I know it is said that this is the old cry. But I would to God it were oftener heard in this House. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understood the gentleman to say—perhaps I misunderstood him—that his objection is only to the constitutionality of this bill. I understand that the gentleman also objects to the policy?

Mr. MONTAGUE. I have just been arguing the policy, but the constitutionality of the bill means the preservation of the American system, chief of which is the responsibility of local self-government. The Constitution is but the concrete philosophy underlying and guaranteeing a dual system. Emasculate the States and you have devitalized the Union. Each in its orbit, when each grows in vigor and virtue.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The gentleman has been for two terms governor of the State of Virginia. He is a southern man, familiar with conditions there and with the temperament of the southern people and the general situation. I ask him to answer me, upon his responsibility to the American Congress, what is his judgment as to the effect of this legislation, if it were constitutional, upon the general situation in the South with reference to the suppression of lynching?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Unfortunately my education has been limited in many respects and I have had no close contact with many of the Southern States. I can reply only as to my own State, and my reply is based upon the statement made a few moments ago, that if the national power comes to supervise the laws of the people of Virginia, or to administer national laws upon police subjects, then there is the inexorable result of neglect of local institutions and the decadence of local governments.

When passion ran rife in the country, in the days of Chandler and Stevens, no such radical measure was brought forward. This bill is a most sinister usurpation by the Federal Government of the police and criminal laws of the several States; and it is but the opening wedge. If the administration of the Federal Government is extended to homicides and misfeasance and malfeasance by State officials, then Federal jurisdiction may easily and logically usurp all State functions. Revolutions do not go backward. The jurisdictions do not contract, they inexorably expand.

Why this revolutionary measure? The magnitude of the individual crime has been the answer. But the protagonist of the bill must seriously doubt its practicability or efficacy. I fear the augmentation and usurpation of Federal power will undermine the very foundations of our institutions. I hope I am wrong. I trust that I am wrong.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman. We should tone up the States of the Union by intelligent discussion and by awakening their sense of responsibility. The Federal Government should not interfere by the assumption of these responsibilities, by the suppression of the essential and sacred duties of communities. I beg the members of this House not to maim and emasculate the States. But rather to stimulate their vigor, not their impotency! This bill is neither expedient, nor wise, nor constitutional. It dislocates our system of government. It will break the morale of our communities; and will strike down the responsibility, the pride, and the hope of the individual citizen, upon whom alone in its final analysis must our civilization rest. I thank the committee for its attention. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DREWRY].

Mr. DREWRY. Mr. Chairman, in a legislative experience of some years I thought I had seen bills presented for attention that held within them possibilities of evil so great that it was inconceivable how the human mind could imagine such measures being enacted into law; but in my whole experience I have never seen a bill that seemed to me to be fraught with so many and such possibilities of danger in it as this, known as the anti-lynching bill. This measure is unnecessary and would be useless if enacted. It is unjust and unfair to a certain section of our country, because it would create a dangerous condition among the people of that section. It is unconstitutional in that it nullifies the most fundamental principles of our Government, principles which have been established for nearly 150 years.

I am not opposed to a proper law to prevent lynching. No one denies that lynching is a crime. I admit, however, I can see no real necessity for another law to punish murder—for that is what lynching is, of course. We now have laws to prevent homicides, but you can hardly pick up a newspaper that you do not read of several. The trouble is not a lack of laws but a lack of enforcement. We have too many laws, and the country would be better off if there could be a suspension of legislation for a few years while the authorities have a chance to catch up with those already on the books. The Republican Party is now being blamed by the country for its continuous sessions of law enactment. Business men everywhere are saying that if they had been allowed to struggle along and depend upon themselves they could have worked out their own salvation by this time; instead of that they waited on Congress to pass laws to make them prosperous, and in a Micawber-like attitude you can see them all over this country of ours still waiting; and they will continue to wait, for legislation of itself does not make men prosperous any more than it makes them good.

Human nature is the same to-day as it was yesterday and as it will continue to be 100 years hence. You may have a law that prescribes punishment for a murderer, but murders are still committed and will be committed until you impress in the heart of man the love for his fellow man that crowds out the blackness of hate and ignorance. You can then go further and pass a law penalizing every specific method by which a homicide is committed. In the pursuance of that you can specifically describe the punishment to be meted out to anyone who deprives or attempts to deprive another of life without authority of law. You will then have another law on your statute books, that is true. But when the good wife, bleeding and choking and gasping for breath from the cruel fingers at her throat so recently released, staggers out into the field where her husband is working and tells him that a fiend in human form attacked her while she, singing in her home, was preparing for his home-coming, and that her tender body had been outraged and the sacred purity of her womanhood had been violated; when that husband picks her up senseless from the shock and bears her back to the home which they were making together, and after the doctor has arrived and the woman is told that the death she craves to hide her shame will not come, what then becomes of your man-made laws? Back to the old Mosaic law the husband goes, back further than that, way back to the jungle days of his primitive ancestry, when the male protected his female from those who would do her harm. All the laws under heaven will fail to restrain his desire to punish the injury. His friends and neighbors join him with the same instinct aroused in them, and the further fear that the same horrible thing may happen to them if that brute or other brutes who hear him boast of his exploits were to escape the consequences of their crimes. Only too well they know the law's delay—their minds revolt at any chance of uncertainty of his punishment. It is the primal instinct of man and can not be trifled with. The criminal must be punished, and without delay. Those are the two elements that cause what is called "lynching"—a feeling of retributive justice to be meted out, and the desire that there should be no possibility of escape for the criminal.

This law, if passed, would, in my opinion, increase instead of decrease lynchings. We would have another law on our statute books not enforced. This law among the ignorant and vicious in some isolated neighborhoods would be looked to as a protection to them in their evil, and they would think they could commit crime with impunity. And if certain crimes were committed in certain sections the perpetrators would be shot down, as mad dogs are shot down, even though your penalty were made ten million instead of ten thousand. No; the remedy is not in bills like this—the remedy is in teaching the ignorant the way of decency—teaching the vicious there is a better way to live than by following the impulses of their vices—teaching the people of our country to respect the laws they now have.

This bill does not merely affect the crimes of the Negro in the South—it has a political phase also. We might as well look the facts in the face. We know it is an attempt on the part of the Republican Party to get the vote of the Negro. What a misguided policy! The Republican Party has his vote now and will continue to have it for many years to come. It is not necessary to pass such a law to get their votes. The Republican Party appointed my distinguished and able State colleague in charge of a committee "to break the solid South." He started off very well. There was a gubernatorial campaign in Virginia and the Republicans put up a good man as their candidate for governor, effected an organization, and got the campaign started in good shape. Their convention refused to allow the Negro to participate and declared for a white man's party. No Negro was allowed in their organization. It made splendid headway and the Democrats were a little uneasy. Just at the psychological moment, however, the head of the Republican Party in the Nation made an address in the South, which was construed as advocating for the Negro political equality, and the campaign fell flat. There seemed to be a difference of opinion on the subject between Virginia Republicans and the Chief Executive, and the people of Virginia decided they could take no chances with the promises of the State Republican platform. Pass this bill, and you will find there are other sections of this country that share the sentiments of Virginia.

Take this bill, if you pass it, and the four nation pact, your alliance with Japan, and the Democrats need no further ammunition for next year's fights. Many years ago the United States erected at the entrance of its Capitol the Peace Monument, that beautiful symbolic statue signifying to the world that forever before the eyes and in the minds of its legislators was the idea that the aftereffects of war were tears and sorrow. With that before the lawmakers there was the hope that there would be no more war, internal or abroad. The United States was looked upon by all the world as a peace-loving Nation. So it was, and after it had avenged the insults that provoked it into entering the last war, it turned all its energies toward securing the peace of the world. The great head of this great Nation was foremost in the scheme of inviting all the countries of the world into a pact that there would be no more wars. The whole war-wearied world was hopeful and looked to the United States for bread and the Republican Party gave them a stone; the world asked for peace and the Republican Party gave them politics. It is still playing politics. Having prevented "the horrible spectacle" of this country forming entangling alliances with all the nations of the world, the Republican Party now forms an entangling alliance with three foreign countries—not peace for the whole world, but war for the whole world if any nation dares attack one of our three allies. Oh, consistency, thou art Republican.

As for internal peace, here at this time when the blood of the North and South is coursing through the poppies of Flanders Field, when the Nation is united and cemented as it has never been before, the Republican Party sees fit to bring in a bill that every man in the South knows will destroy the peace in the hearts of our countrymen. This bill will make doubly difficult our problem, which I had hoped was nearer an understanding. It can mean nothing to the vicious element of our population but that they will be protected in their outrages and that they need not fear immediate expiation for their guilt when caught. They will not understand it. Some of them will even look on it as if it was enacted for their especial benefit. You gentlemen of the Republican Party, when the people of this country again ask you for peace, do not again give them politics.

But there is even a greater evil in this bill than that—an evil which if enacted into our laws destroys the greatest experiment in government ever tried by men; an evil which strikes a blow at the very foundation of our country and will cause the United States to totter to its fall. If this bill can be enacted into law, then the entire fabric of our Government is torn to shreds. Section 5 of this bill gives the Federal Government the right to sue any county of any sovereign State for $10,000 for the use of the family of the person put to death, and the only proof necessary for the recovery of this amount is that the person was "put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage" in said county. In other words, the people of any county subdivision of any State can be taxed to pay for the act of any "five or more persons" committing or attempting to commit the crime of lynching. These "five persons" may gather secretly in the dead of the night in some locality far removed from the office of the sheriff or constables or other officers of the county, who may be peacefully sleeping in their beds, unaware of the contemplated action of these five men, and commit or attempt to commit a crime, and the people of the county will be mulcted in their money or property. If the sum of $10,000 can be taken out of the pockets of the citizens of a county who were sleeping in their beds at the time of the commission of a crime and knew nothing about it and had no sympathy with it, then it follows that the Government at Washington, acting under the control of Congress, at its own sweet will can impoverish every taxpayer in every county in every State in the Union. It also follows that it can impoverish every State in the Union. It also follows that the result of the passage of this law will be that every sovereign State becomes a mere dependency of the Federal Government. All State lines might as well be abolished and the entire framework of our Constitution changed if such a thing as this can be done. And I wish to remind you gentlemen who are advocating this measure that the doctrine of State rights is not to-day a peculiarly southern view.

Not long ago from the State of Abraham Lincoln came a wail from the president of the State university over the invasion of State rights by the Federal Government in the matter of education. I have some recollection also of reading in the newspapers within the last year a protest along the same line by the State of Wisconsin. It is a serious thing to have slight regard for the fundamental principles which have controlled our Government since its beginning.

If you will permit me to quote Thomas Jefferson:

These—

said Jefferson, in citing the essential principles of our Government—should be the creed of our political faith, the text of civic instruction, the touchstone by which to try the services of those we trust; and should we wander from them in moments of error or of alarm let us hasten to retrace our steps and to regain the road which alone leads to peace, liberty, and safety.

Although uttered by Jefferson, the Republican Party would do well to heed the sentiments here expressed. It has been put in power by a large vote, but the people of the States will hold it responsible for such legislation as this. It will be held responsible for a deviation from fundamental principles to serve local and temporary party expediency. This bill does not merely strike at the unlawful acts of those attempting to punish crime peculiar to the South and its vicious Negro element, it touches every crime committed by five or more persons in every county in this country from the beautiful green mountains of Vermont to the golden shores of California.

This is not a question of partisanship nor politics; it is a question that strikes at the first principles of our constitutional government. The issue is clear cut; it is so clear that there can be no beclouding by confusing argument. You are either for making your county and State a dependency of the Federal Government, or you are for allowing it to retain the autonomy given it under the Constitution. Your vote on this measure, like Banquo's ghost, will never "down"; it will forever rise up against you. For your country's sake, gentlemen, and for the sake of your oath to uphold the Constitution of your country, kill this bill and let it lie. I will warrant you no intellectual buzzard flying over will ever light on its carcass.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, the Members of the House appear to be unanimous on the question of the existence and the undesirability of the crime of lynching. We are all agreed on that, and every man that has spoken either for or against this bill professes to be in favor of stopping this awful blot on American civilization. Neither is there any question about the demand for Federal legislation. I hold in my hand a memorial from men and women representing one-tenth of the entire citizenship of this country, who are asking for this legislation. There was a time, Mr. Chairman, when a great statesman of my State was censured by the House of Representatives for presenting a petition signed by black men; but, thank God, that time has gone, as they are now citizens of the United States under the provisions of the Constitution and are entitled to be heard. The memorial to which I refer is as follows:

Memorial and petitions to the Congress of the United States of America for a Federal law against mob murder and lynchings.

JOHN WESLEY A. M. E. ZION CHURCH, FOURTEENTH AND CORCORAN STREETS,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1921.

To the House of Representatives of the United States Congress and to the individual Members thereof:

The Second Colored World Democracy Congress, now in session under the auspices of the National Equal Rights League, with full confidence in the sincere and enlightened patriotism of your honorable Congressmen, do herein memorialize you in behalf of our constituency of 11,000,000 American citizens and do petition for the passage of a Federal law against mob violence, murder, and lynchings in the form of the Dyer antilynching bill, already approved by a majority of your Judiciary Committee. We believe that it is now time, with the advance of general intelligence and of religion, with the progress of world civilization, with the noble part taken by all elements of the American people in a bloody World War to save civilization and to establish world democracy, for the awful practice of mob murder and lynching of human beings and American citizens to be ended, or, at least, for the Federal Government to undertake this work for the fair name of our Republic.

For 40 years, even unto now, lynchings have gone on at the recorded rate of more than one for every single week, which demonstrates actually, if not theoretically, that the present system of remedy by local or State jurisdiction is impotent to remove this great blot. Let our great Republic, which repeatedly has interfered with the violations of humanity's cause in other countries and which even now assumes the moral leadership of the world, cease to be well-nigh the only country where the lynching of its own citizens is of almost daily occurrence.

The passage now of this Dyer bill will show the world, assembled here at our call for world peace, that we ourselves are sincere and will increase the potency of an influence for the accomplishment of the aim of this historic conference for world peace and armament limitation.

In the name of the Constitution, of our country's repute, of her position in world leadership, and in the name of her helpless children, done to death by cowardly mobs, we close this our earnest prayer.

Mr. Chairman, a similar petition might come from our fellow citizens of Hebrew extraction, members of whose race have been lynched by mobs incited by race prejudice. It might also come from our Italian-American citizens whose former fellow countrymen have met the same fate. In that there is no question about the demand for some Federal legislation that shall deal in a comprehensive way with the whole question of preventing, if possible, this barbaric practice and of protecting the lives of American citizens and of citizens of other countries in cases where the State authorities neglect or refuse to perform that imperative duty, I have been somewhat surprised and amused by this vociferous cry of unconstitutionality that has been raised against this particular measure. Now, the original Dyer bill (H. R. 13), introduced in this House at the beginning of the present session, is identical in its provisions with the bill reported to the House of Representatives by the Judiciary Committee in the last Congress, and was originally based on three bills, one introduced by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] (H. R. 259), one by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] (H. R. 14097), and one by myself (H. R. 4123). The bill introduced by Mr. DYER and the one introduced by me differed in some particulars, but contained substantially the same provisions as a bill that was introduced in this House almost a quarter of a century ago by no less a person than the Hon. William H. Moody, of Massachusetts, afterwards Attorney General and Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. Mr. Moody, a great constitutional lawyer, believed that the bill was constitutional.

The last section of the original Dyer bill, which deals with the question of lynching of nationals of other countries, was originally drawn by no less a constitutional lawyer than Hon. William H. Taft, now Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, for a committee of the American Bar Association, and was repeatedly introduced in the House as a separate bill by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

It may be that there are some sections in this bill—and I think that the original bill, which is crossed out in the text before us, is very much better than the committee amendment; and I shall oppose the committee amendment—there may be some doubt, I repeat, as to the constitutionality or advisability of some sections of the bill. But it can be amended; and if the bill in its amended form becomes a law, and the question of its constitutionality comes before the Supreme Court of the United States at some time in the future, that independent branch of the Government will decide the question. If the gentlemen opposing this bill are so absolutely confident that the Supreme Court of the United States will certainly declare it null and void, why filibuster against its passage and try to prevent its enactment? What are you afraid of? I almost suspect that you are afraid the Supreme Court may sustain the law.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. May I suggest to the gentleman that there are our oaths.

Mr. DALLINGER. I wish to remind the gentleman from Tennessee that the brilliant and learned arguments against the national child labor bill, the unconstitutionality of which was later declared by the Supreme Court, did not deter a Democratic Congress from passing that measure by an overwhelming vote. Moreover, you gentlemen have passed bills through this House for which there is no constitutional authority whatever. I will ask the Members of this House who voted for the bill to give $20,000,000 in grain to the Russian people, where is there any constitutional authority for such an appropriation of the money of the American people? Can you find any expressed or implied power authorizing it? You can not do it. You can not even sustain its constitutionality by an appeal to the doctrine of resulting power. It is only when a bill comes up that you are opposed to that you raise the constitutional question.

I would recommend that these gentlemen who are so certain that the Supreme Court is going to decide that this bill is unconstitutional attend the sessions of the Supreme Court of the United States when the decisions of that tribunal are announced and listen to dissenting opinion after dissenting opinion in which the minority judges, often four out of the nine, will call attention to the fact that the decision of the majority is contrary to every precedent established by the court from the foundation of this Government. Perhaps some of you were present the other morning when the decision of the court in the so-called Beechnut case was read, and you remember that the minority opinions called attention to the fact that there was no substantial difference between that case and the Colgate case, where the decision had been directly contrary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. DALLINGER. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from New York brushed aside very unceremoniously the case of Ex parte Virginia when their attention was repeatedly called to it by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

I just want to read what the Supreme Court of the United States said in that case in regard to this question of the liability of State officials:

> A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty, without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or to evade it.

No language could be clearer. There is no question at all but that the provisions of this bill which punish the officers of a State for refusing or denying to the citizens of the United States the equal protection of the laws are constitutional under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, we all realize that lynchings constitute one of the worst blots on the national escutcheon, and I am sure that the good people of the South realize it just as much as do the good people of the North, and that they are just as anxious to stop it. I can not conceive that any right-minded man could take any other attitude toward the question. I have not the slightest patience with any attempt to palliate it or to excuse it. There have been about 3,500 lynchings within a period of 20 years, lynchings at the rate of 175 a year. It is shocking, it is awful that such things should occur in a country like ours, and I believe that we ought to stop it if there is any power within the Federal Government to do it, especially when some of the great States of the South say they can not do it, and when their executives appeal to the Federal Government for aid to stop it. We have heard from the governor of the State of Arkansas and from the governor of another State in the South, admitting that those States can not cope with the situation. So, if there is any power under the Constitution to deal effectively with this question, we certainly should exercise that power, and I believe there is; but I do not believe that in attempting to exercise that power we should tear the Constitution to tatters, and I do not believe, if we can avoid it, that we should create causes of friction between the States and the Federal Government.

This power, in my opinion, can be exercised under the fourteenth amendment and under no other provision of the Constitution. That is the very provision which by its terms confines us to its operation for the solution of this question. That provision, as has been said over and over again here—and it is just as clear as that black is black and white is white—runs to the States and not to individuals. Oh, they have cited the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution and the Mann Act under the interstate commerce clause, and they have cited the prohibition amendment, but the interstate commerce provision of the Constitution and the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution run to individuals, run to every individual in the land. If any individual violates any statute framed to carry out the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, of course he is guilty under the very language of the constitutional provision, and the same is true of the interstate commerce clause in so far as there is a violation of interstate commerce under a Federal statute. This is an entirely different proposition, however. When the fourteenth amendment was adopted, it was not intended to punish individuals as such. It was intended to punish the States through their legislative, their executive, or judicial officers. The only way that you can punish a State, if you can call it punishment when the act is the act of the legislature, is by declaring the act of the legislature unconstitutional. There is no other way in which you can punish a State.

You can not tax a State, you can not impose a fine upon a State. We can not tax our State bonds under the income tax law, we can not tax our municipal bonds under the income tax law, we can not tax the salaries even of State officers under the income tax laws. Then what is the use of talking about taxing a State, what is the use of talking about imposing penalties on States under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution? There are provisions here that impose a fine upon a State, upon a county of a State in which a lynching is committed, even though every reasonable effort was made by every officer clothed with authority to prevent the lynching. Yet from the very fact that a lynching occurs you seek to impose a fine upon a county, and as if that were not absurd enough to heighten the absurdity, you impose a fine upon every county through which the lynching party passes to the lynching, even though in every county every official, ministerial or judicial, clothed with authority to enforce the law did everything in his power to prevent the lynching. It must be admitted that lynchings may occur, even though all of the officers of the State do all they can in their power to prevent them. You must admit that possibility, and yet you have not provided against that possibility.

We have not had a lynching in the State of New York, thank God, since the Civil War, and I am immensely proud of our record. Yet we have had offenses committed there for which lynchings are had in other States, and the men of the State of New York are just as jealous of the honor of and just as eager to protect their women as the men of any State in the Union. We believe in letting the law take its course, however. We do not believe in mob violence. We do not permit mob violence, and all our citizens are as a unit on that proposition.

Something can be done under the fourteenth amendment, because I believe that when that amendment was framed it was designed to cover every officer of the State from the highest to the lowest, and I believe you can pass a law, and I believe that the Supreme Court of the United States would sustain it, punishing as heavily as you see fit to punish any officer of the State, no matter of what rank he may be, from the executive head of the government to the lowest official, who is clothed by law with the authority and the duty to protect the citizen. And that is the kind of law which we should pass. That is a law which would be effective; that is a law which would be constitutional; that would be a law which would not cause friction between the States and the Federal Government, as many of the provisions of this act I fear would do and that would be a result very, very greatly to be lamented. We must amend this bill, but we must pass it, in order to do our duty to the citizens of the country who are denied the equal protection of the laws in the most shameless, the most barbarous, the most inhuman form of lynching. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. SPROUL.

Mr. SPROUL. Mr. Chairman, lynch law is mob law; in other words, the unreasoning fury of popular passion. It is action which casts aside the orderly processes of justice and gives free reign to the brutal instincts of the cave man. Its indulgence in this country has achieved the "bad eminence" which causes the Encyclopedia Britannica to state that "it is essentially and almost peculiarly an American institution." An awful indictment, indeed, against the greatest, most powerful Government of the world. Unfortunately, however, the indictment is true, Mr. Chairman, and because of this I shall, by my vote for the pending bill, express my abhorrence for the practices which it seeks to check and thus to remove the stigma upon our people.

There was a time in the history of this country when lynch law was what might be called a necessary evil. That was in the days when the great West was being opened up by the pioneers of present-day civilization. In those days, in those places, society was unorganized, and hence evildoers met with short shrift. It was lynch law, not civil law, that cleared the western forests, valleys, and mountain passes of horse and cattle thieves and other robbers, outlaws, gamblers, and murderers. There was then a reasonable excuse for the exercise of popular justice, so called, an excuse utterly unavailable in communities where the machinery of the law has been in operation for generations. Nothing but condemnation can be visited upon people anywhere who take the law into their own hands and take human life for some alleged crime without giving the accused an opportunity to prove his innocence, if he is able to do so, or make him pay the penalty for his deed after proper trial and conviction.

There is no sectionalism in this bill, Mr. Chairman. It applies to all sections of the country alike. I care not whether the outrage upon the law of the land is perpetrated in Illinois or Texas, in Massachusetts, or in Mississippi. The offense is as damnable in one State as in another. It is an offense against society, for it lessens the respect for the majesty of the law which every good citizen ought to bear within himself and demand of his fellows. The temple of justice is the handiwork of centuries; not a stone can be removed from it without danger to the whole edifice. In a Republic like ours every citizen ought to be a high priest of justice and tolerate no palliation of any act that tends to undermine the foundations of the venerable structure.

I am no lawyer, Mr. Chairman, and will not presume, therefore, to examine the legal whys and wherefores of the proposed legislation. That is an undertaking which may safely be left to the many able Members of this House who are versed in the law. To me this bill appeals and compels my vote because I view its purpose and provisions from a purely humanitarian standpoint. The protection to life and liberty which I claim for myself I want to be the boon of every man, woman, and child that lives under the Stars and Stripes. The justice I invoke when in stress of the law I would not withhold from the poorest and the humblest in the land, whether white or black, red or yellow, whether native born or foreigner, whether resident or "stranger within the gates."

If we examine dispassionately the features of this measure, we shall not find anything inconsistent with the principles of justice or the dictates of humanity. What does it say? Every State, every county, and every city within a State must guarantee to every human being within its confines the natural and constitutional right to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." If it fails in this, if it does not exert all its legal and physical power either to prevent crime or punish it, whether committed by an individual or a mob of persons; if it does not exercise the authority with which organized society has invested it, the proposed law declares it guilty and certain penalties follow. Again, if a sworn officer fails to protect a prisoner committed to his care against mob violence, this bill imposes upon him the penalties of fine or imprisonment, or both, after trial and conviction. Surely there is nothing obnoxious to our sense of just and fair dealing, nothing that may not be demanded as right and proper of lawfully constituted State, county, or municipal authorities. It is not enough for a sheriff or a jailor to lock the prison doors against a mob and bid it disperse. With all the physical force he can summon to his aid he must defend his prisoner, even though he know that that prisoner is guilty of an offense punishable by the extreme penalty of death.

But, Mr. Chairman, that which specially meets my approval of this bill is the provision which makes every county or city in which mob violence runs riot and brings about the death by lynching of any person directly responsible for the acts of the mob. More than this, every county through which a victim is taken by such a mob and carried to a place of execution is declared equally guilty with the county in which the riot originated and is made to bear equal punishment. Through the power and processes of the Federal courts the imposition and enforcement of the penalties is assured, and in this way the entire community is held responsible and is made to suffer for the excesses of any number of its residents. In addition to this vicarious physical punishment of the whole population of the county comes the even greater moral infliction of putting the county and the State in the pillory of shame before the judgment of the people of the United States—nay, of the world. Which one of you, my colleagues on this floor, would not suffer in his soul unspeakable agony to have a part of his constituency thus held up to the scorn of mankind. Every good man values his reputation, for—

> Good name in man and woman
> Is the immediate jewel of their souls;
> Who steals my purse, steals trash,
> 'Twas mine, 'tis his, and has been slave to thousands;
> But he who filches from me my good name
> Robs me of that which not enriches him
> And makes me poor, indeed.

The bill places the severest penalties upon persons taking part in a lynching, either as principals or accessories. It says that—> any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof shall be imprisoned for life or for not less than five years.

Yet, I think, Mr. Chairman, those who framed this bill might have tightened the strap just one more notch and have imposed the death penalty upon the person or persons who are proved guilty of the actual deed of the unlawful killing. For such unlawful killing is murder; no more, no less. Murder just as much as the killing done by the thug that shoots his victim from ambush. And just as cowardly or more so. For the professional thug goes upon his errand unaided, while the lyncher does his act supported by a mob. Lynching is not a case of man to man; it is the cowardly putting to death of a human being by a crowd, each one of whom is as bloodthirsty as the actual executioner.

Let us visualize a mob, Mr. Chairman:

> A compound mass of human beings in which each one has for the moment all the follies and evil passions of the rest in addition to his own.

Generally the mobbers have fired their spirits with ardent liquor; sometimes their passions have been aroused by frenzied harangues; and there have been occasions when mobs have gone to their murderous task just "like butchers, to make a Roman holiday." In the very nature of things, a mob bent upon lynching has divested itself of reason and judgment. It can not, nay, will not consider for a moment the question whether or not its intended victim is really guilty of an alleged crime, or possibly has been wrongfully accused. It does not, even for a moment, pause to consider the fact that each one of the crowd sets out deliberately to break the law, and, with malice aforethought, is ready to commit murder. For, Mr. Chairman, in more than one instance not only the prisoner has been done to death, but the sheriff or jailer also who, firm in his sense of duty, tried to keep that prisoner safe from unlawful violence.

There is another aspect. The first section of this bill defines a—> mob or riotous assemblage—

> an assemblage of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

In order to bring about such an assemblage there must have been an initiative. A mob is not a spontaneous eruption. The assemblage of five or more persons has been brought about by incitement or suggestion from some one. It is therefore in its initial stage a conspiracy. Against what? Not merely against an individual, but against the peace and dignity of the State; worse yet, Mr. Chairman, against the fame and reputation of the community. So, then, we have a twofold infraction of the law; first, the conspiracy for the commission of an unlawful act; second, the actual commission of the lawless deed. Will any one dare to deny, Mr. Chairman, that the National Government has not only the right, but that it is its bounden duty, whenever a State fails to give protection to life and liberty, to take measures to ensure such protection? Because the National Government has failed to do this but has deferred to the authority of the several States, is that a reason why it should continue in this derelictness in view of the fact—as set out in the committee's report on this bill—that the Constitution gives the mandate for its action?

Lynch law, "this disgraceful evil," as former President Wilson designates it, "can not," to further quote him, "live when the community does not countenance it." Well, Mr. Chairman, I turn again to the committee report on this bill and find there that in the 30 years from 1889 to 1918, 3,224 persons were lynched, two-thirds of them Negroes and more than two-thirds in the South. I find further that, in 1919, 83 persons were lynched; in 1920, 65; and in 1921, statistics not complete, 52 were thus violently done to death by hanging, shooting, burning, and drowning. Is it conceivable, I ask, that these thousands of hangings, shootings, burnings, and drownings could have been perpetrated if the communities in the midst of whom they were carried out had not countenanced them? If there be any doubt in anyone's mind that they were so countenanced, let him search the records and see if any member of the mobs that did these atrocious deeds was ever brought to trial, or if tried convicted. He will search in vain.

The pending bill then presents three cardinal points—procedure against the participants in a lynching; procedure against the officer of the law who fails in his duty to give proper protection to the prisoner committed to his custody; procedure against the community in whose midst a lynching is permitted to be carried on. As to the form in which these points are framed in the bill, I refrain from comment, because, as I said at the outset of my remarks, I am not a lawyer and not versed in the forms of law; but I am in full accord with the spirit of the proposed legislation. It brings directly before the eyes of the people of every State of the Union the constitutional function of the National Government in cases where the State fails to give equal protection to all its citizens, and it serves notice that it will exercise all necessary power to function properly and effectively according to the mandate of the Constitution. After the enactment of this law, if every State will make proclamation thereof, the mob spirit will be curbed out of fear of threatened penalties. If it is not so restrained, but pursues its evil aims, the State will exert its powers to forestall the exercise of the Federal police powers within its borders. Counties and cities will not fail in the endeavor, at least, to prevent outbreaks of mob violence. Greater vigilance will be exercised to avert plots and conspiracies having for their object the lawless punishment of supposed criminals under the guardianship of the law's servants.

Mr. Chairman, I have the utmost faith in the ultimate, if not the immediate, beneficent effect of this legislation. If I did not so believe, I would not give it my vote. I believe it will go far to curb the outbreak of brutal force against helpless prisoners. I believe it will engender a higher respect for the law and the order of the community. I believe we shall, as the years go by, hear less of lynchings and attempted lynchings. I hope to see the United States cleared of the stigma cast upon it by the quotation, in the very beginning of my remarks, that lynching "is essentially and peculiarly an American institution." Advanced as I am in years, I hope to see the day when in every town and hamlet in our beautiful land it may be said in truth and conscience by all the dwellers therein:

Of law there can be no less acknowledged than that her seat is the bosom of God, her voice the harmony of the world; all things do her homage, the very least as feeling her care; and the greatest as not exempted from her power; both angels and men and creatures of what condition soever, though each in different sort and manner, yet all with uniform consent admiring her as the mother of their peace and joy.

Finally, I shall vote for this bill because I see in it the seed of humanizing influences. It will do its work in restraining the evil disposed, and give pause to those inclined to be influenced by wicked counsels and the promptings of passion. Its restraining power will be felt in every part of our country whenever passion threatens to upset reason. It will set up the standard of the law to be revered and worshiped by all who live under its folds.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BIRD].

Mr. BIRD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my learned and distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], referred to that eminent work entitled "The Crowd," by Monsieur Gustav Le Bon, that deals with the proposition that men, when gathered together as a crowd, if they become inflamed, will act far differently than they would act as normal men. The history of this country is showing that there is coming into the Nation an indefensible institution called "the mob," and the effort of this bill is to establish mob action as being a crime that can be reached by the Federal authorities. The gentleman from Virginia came very close to the crux of the situation, though I differ from him entirely in his conclusions. The sheriff, in refusing to act and carry out the law, may not be acting in the real sense for the State, but when he is backed up by a public opinion that causes him to believe that he is justified in not carrying out his duties under the law, then is when the Federal Government can step in and say that there is a condition existing that it must reach. And this bill reaches that situation, first, by punishing State and municipal officers who fail to do their duty in protecting the lives of persons from mobs; second, by punishing the crime of lynching; and, third, by compelling the county in which the crime is committed to make compensation; or, in other words, it proposes to handle every phase of the evil. It provides for those officers, high and low, who are intrusted upon their oaths to preserve the peace and to protect the lives and the properties of the communities; it handles the actual participants of the crime; and it also provides for the chastening of public opinion in the community permitting such cowardly crime by declaring a forfeiture and, if necessary, levying a tax upon it. Any measure doing less would provide but half of a remedy for the evil, and it may be easily prophesied that with the provisions of this bill in force public sentiment in the various localities will quickly be spurred and awakened to its duty.

As to Congress having the right to deal with the individual officer or with the lyncher, there can be little doubt. The only question that arises in this bill is the right of the Federal Government to declare a penalty upon a subdivision of a State government. Viewed in the light of the decisions of the Supreme Court, which permit the going to the extent necessary to control and counteract State abridgment, we can properly reason that when a condition that deprives citizens of equal protection of our laws is based upon public opinion—a public opinion that tolerates and at times even fosters lawlessness—then the step necessary to stop the ravages of the crime is to awaken public opinion by forfeiture. We have been sitting supinely by with folded hands upon this subject for many years, afraid to embark because of it being largely a question of the South and the colored man. Yet, claiming to be the friend of the black race of people, we have stood by year after year and have seen him diabolically butchered—cowardly—without even the semblance of a trial to see whether or not even the slightest suspicion is well founded.

We are not seeking to protect the criminal but the citizen who, because of race prejudice or heated public sentiment, is not afforded the protection of the laws. It has gone so far that many people of the Southern States are rebelling from the atrocities and freely admitting them. No doubt you have all of you received the purported statement of Gov. Dorsey, of Georgia, to the conference of citizens at Atlanta on April 22 last to deal with the subject. The governor freely admits the atrocities of mob rule in his State, and the existence even of peonage, but clings to the pride of his State, that it shall deal with conditions that they have had 50 years to deal with, and have made no real advance during any or all of that time.

Over a long period of years these lynchings in 42 of the various States of the Union have taken place, and the time has now come when we should declare, as a legislative fact, that the States of the Union in a sufficient number have failed to extend to the various people and the various citizens of the Union equal protection, so that it becomes our duty now to place a law at hand that will reach the situation.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman know of a single instance where a sheriff has deliberately turned a prisoner over to a mob to be executed?

Mr. BIRD. I have known not only one but several.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Cite them.

Mr. BIRD. By common report I have known a number of instances of where sheriffs have had men in custody and they have allowed them, without great resistance, to be taken, and the sheriffs have been continued in office by the sufferance of public opinion.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I would thank the gentleman to cite one single instance.

Mr. BIRD. Sheriff Shipp, of Chattanooga, Tenn.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I never heard of it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Did not the Supreme Court have him up here and finally discharge him, and hold that he was not culpable?

Mr. BIRD. The Supreme Court sent him to jail.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not think so.

Mr. BIRD. I refer to the Two hundred and fourteenth United States. Now, this law is a law to make the crime of lynching a Federal crime. So far as the constitutionality of it is concerned, I am frank to say that I started out in investigating it believing that it probably was unconstitutional, but after seeing the method by which it proposes to handle the dereliction of the States, and that it reaches to the crowd mind and awakens it by lashing public opinion through public opinion's pocketbook—the only way it can really be successfully lashed—I am confident that it is a constitutonal measure.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Under what provision of the Constitution do you think the Federal Congress can legislate in regard to the public opinion of a State?

Mr. BIRD. I will say this to the gentleman from Texas, that though this may be a new form of legislation, the same thing was said about the act that bears the name of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. It was said that that was an excursion into a new field. I say that if this is an excursion it is high time that we were taking it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield eight minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON].

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just spoken replied to my question that Sheriff Shipp was sent to jail. He was not sent to jail for participation in a lynching but for contempt of court. So I do not think his answer was very pertinent.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have but a few minutes. This morning the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] went into the historical discussion of this crime, in which he hooked it up with cannibalism, and he spoke of the cruelties that had originated, that had come about, that had grown out of the lynching proposition. I want to call the attention of this committee to the fact that the cruelty of burning persons was not originated by the lynchers but was originated by the law of the States of the Northeast, who built it up and who sold the Negroes to us. I will cite the record and not go any further:

Att a Court holden for the tryal of negro and Indian slaves at the Citty Hall of the Citty of New-York, on Tuesday the 15th day of April, Anno Dom. 1712.

Present: Caleb Heathscope, William Smith, Edward Blagge, Esquires, Justices.

Court opened—

Dom Regina v. Tom the Negro man, slave of Nicholas Rossvelt, J. D.

The defendt Tom being brought to the Barr & having nothing to say for himself why judgment of death should not pass agt him according to the verdict &c. It is considered by the Court that he be carreyed from hence to the place from whence he came and from thence to the place of execution and thence to be burned with a slow fire that he may continue in torment for eight or ten hours and continue burning in said fire until he be dead and consumed to ashes.

Now, that is not any hypothetical case. That is a record of the court of the State of New York, whence the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANSORGE] shed some tears for the colored man the other day.

Mr. FENN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. FENN. This gentleman was given a trial, was he not?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; he was given a trial; but he was burned and tortured, and a great deal worse, and that is where it came from. When the colored people were brought down South we modified the practice, and when the Civil War occurred there was only one offense for which a slave could be burned—in most of the States he could not be burned at all—and that was for the murder of his master.

Mr. BIRD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. BIRD. Do you wish to perpetuate it?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir. In my State of South Carolina they are doing more to reduce this crime than they are doing in the State of Kansas.

A great deal has been said about where lynching originated, where it started. I will tell you where it started in South Carolina. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] stated the other day that a great many of the lynchings were for absolutely nothing. Let me read you the record from the State of South Carolina:

In January, 1871, Matt Stevens, an inoffensive white man who had lost an arm in the Confederate service, was going from Union Court House, driving his wagon, in which were some barrels of whisky which he was transporting in the pursuit of his business as wagoner. On the public highway he met a company of Scott's Negro militia, numbering about 40, some of whom demanded that he should give them whisky. He complied to the extent of giving them all that he had in a bottle, but refused to let them interfere with the barrels. Thereupon he was seized, abused, beaten, and finally shot to death.

Of course, according to Dr. VOLSTEAD, the culprit ought to have been hanged and quartered, but the law had not been passed that way. [Laughter.]

That is the first record of a lynching in South Carolina. But this bill would not touch it for an instant. Why? Because that man was not accused of a crime, and he was lynched by a riotous crowd, but not taken from the custody of an officer. But then and there they called forth the deepest curse, which we are struggling to overcome. What was the result? That a large body of white people of the Anglo-Saxon race rose against those people, and with such force as they could raise they disarmed that band and put most of them in jail. What was the result? The carpetbag government turned around and began steps to liberate them. Then the white folks went back and took them out. They looked into it, and they turned loose those that they deemed were not guilty and hung the rest. The white people have been fighting against it from that day to this, and we have enacted and enforced the law against it. What has been the outcome? Let me give you 25 years of history, so that you will see whether you will be any better under the Federal statute. Here is the record from 1894 down to date: From 1894 to 1898, five years, there were 36 men lynched in South Carolina. From 1899 to 1903 there were 19 lynchings. From 1904 to 1908 there were 15 lynchings. From 1909 to 1913 there were 14 lynchings. From the year 1914 to 1918, inclusive, there were 8 lynchings, and in the year 1919 there were only 2 lynchings.

Now, do you say we are not attempting to maintain the dignity of the law and protect the man who is accused of crime in South Carolina? Do you think you will help it any by bringing in a foreign jurisdiction that will be resented by our people?

In New York on the 27th day of May, 1917, there were 2,000 people engaged in a race riot, and four or five hundred of them, perhaps, were killed or injured. In Springfield, Ill., there was a race riot, and at East St. Louis on July 2, 1917, 37 colored people and 8 white people were killed, more than have been lynched in South Carolina in the last 15 years.

At Washington, D. C., July 27–31, 1919, there were 6 killed and 100 injured in a race riot.

At Chicago, Ill., July 28–31, 1919, there were 38 killed and 1,500 injured in a race riot. None of these riots came within the terms of this bill.

Under this statute the governor of the State can be imprisoned for failure to have a prisoner protected—see lines 23, 24, 25 on page 11 and line 1, page 12. The police officers of every city in the Union are liable to arrest, and, followed to its logical conclusion, Congress can not only provide to imprison them but can provide for others to take their places and centralize all authority in Washington. New York, Chicago, Cleveland, St. Louis, and San Francisco can be governed by Metropolitan police named in Washington if the principles of this bill stand the test. But what of the reason for it? The reason is that some people have appointed themselves guardian of the Negro. We of the South know him and have carried the burden. No race wars occur there. Many have occurred in the North and in the West in the last few years, a limited list of which I have given above.

It is many years since such things have occurred in the South. A large per cent of the colored people live side by side with the whites on the best of terms. Each knows the boundary which must not be passed. But we are a rural people. Frequently the distances between houses are long, and there is always the fear in going from home to neighbors or to school that the young girl may meet the black demon who occasionally develops—inflamed with passion, powerful in physique, reckless of consequences, brute in every fiber—and be assaulted, abused, and often contaminated with horrible venereal disease, and left dead, or worse; or he goes to the house of a young farmer, who is busily engaged in the field, beyond the cry of his terrorized wife, and, seizing her, he crushes, ravishes, and destroys her; and oftentimes, to prevent her living to identify him, he cuts her throat—pistol shots would raise an alarm, hence the knife—and leaves a bleeding, dying, mutilated body to meet the horrified eyes of her husband on his return.

Do you wonder that he and his neighbors and kinsmen wreak vengeance on the foul brute who is caught with her blood on him? Did our forefathers not so deal with the Indian who tomahawked the women and children? And can manhood be bred out of the race? I do not condone lynching under any circumstances; but I can not forget that they, as well as I, are human, and there are limitations to human endurance. But it is said that if detected he would pay the penalty according to law, and that is true; but let us look at that from another angle. Suppose the little ravished girl lives and can identify her assailant, and he is arrested and called to trial. This tender and terrorized child must go before a grand jury of 18 men and tell her story of humiliation and horror; and then, in the open court, she must face the vulgar gaze of the gaping, curious crowd that always hangs around. She must go on the stand, subject to cross-examination, and relate all the disgusting and horrifying details of her humiliation, testifying to things that even the prostitute blushes to mention, and then come out, with every idle dealer in gossip pointing at her as the girl who was ravished by so-and-so. Do you wonder that men shrink from making a girl go through a hell like that? Do you wonder that human nature sometimes breaks all bounds and overturns all law under this strain? Do you suppose, if you pass this bill, you will better this awful thing? When reason is dethroned, law is forgotten. We have been dealing with this evil, and South Carolina has made great progress. You will only foment agitation and resentment by this bill. The juries will be the same no matter in what court you call the case. The State authorities will cease to enforce their laws, shifting the burden on the National Government, with the result that local cooperation will be paralyzed, and the latter end of the matter will be worse than the first.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

DEAR MR. COOLIDGE: I respectfully transmit herewith the report of the Director of the Census, made in compliance with the resolution adopted by the Senate on December 14, 1921, requiring him to collect statistics concerning the number of bales of cotton ginned for the period from August 1, 1921, to December 1, 1921.

Yours, faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER,
Secretary of Commerce.

REPORT OF THE DIRECTOR OF THE CENSUS.

JANUARY 17, 1922.

The SECRETARY OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: On December 14, 1921, the Senate of the United States passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the Director of the Census be, and he hereby is, directed to ascertain from the ginners, for the period from August 1, 1921, to December 1, 1921, the total number of bales of cotton ginned by each ginner, the total weight of the cotton ginned, and the average weight per bale; and to find the average weight per bale of the total number of bales thus reported, and to report the same to the Senate as early as possible, such findings and report not to include linters."

I have the honor to transmit herewith six tables giving the statistics collected in compliance with this resolution.

The records of the Bureau of the Census show that there were 21,080 cotton ginneries in the United States on December 1, 1921, and that prior to that date 15,960 had ginned some cotton from the crop of 1921. All of the ginneries, both active and idle, were sent copies of the Senate resolution with the request that they furnish statistics of the number of bales of cotton ginned, the total weight of cotton ginned in pounds, and the average weight per bale in pounds for all cotton ginned from August 1, 1921, to December 1, 1921, square and round bales being reported separately. They were also requested to make a separate report on the quantity of linters, so as to insure the exclusion of linters from the statistics of the quantity of cotton ginned. A copy of the card schedule is transmitted herewith.

Of the total number of ginneries (21,080), returns, in compliance with this request, were received from 6,251. Of this number 1,338, or 21 per cent, apparently secured the statistics from records, and reports from them may, I believe, be accepted as a true indication of the average weight of the bale. The statistics for these ginneries are given in Table 2. They show that the 1,338 ginneries ginned 689,222 bales of cotton during the period from August 1, 1921, to December 1, 1921, and that these bales weighed 342,061,182 pounds, an average of 496.3 pounds per bale.

Reports were received from 1,579 ginners which indicated that the statistics concerning the weight of the cotton ginned were obtained by multiplying the average weight of bale by the number of bales ginned. The statistics for these ginneries are given in Table 3. They, however, should not be accepted as a true indication of the actual average weight per bale.

Reports were received from 431 ginneries which did not give the weight of the lint cotton, but instead the seed cotton. The statistics for these ginneries are given in Table 5.

There were 1,364 which showed the number of bales ginned and the average weight, but not the pounds. These ginneries were classified according to the average weight of the bale. The data in Table 4 show the number of ginneries and the number of bales reported for each classification. It is noted that a considerable number of the ginneries showed an even 500 pounds as an average weight.

Table 6 shows the number of ginneries which reported only the number of bales ginned, reporting neither the total pounds nor the average weight. There were 500 reports of this character. One thousand one hundred and thirteen ginneries reported that no cotton had been ginned during the period.

You will note that returns were received for less than one-third of the ginneries. It is probable that additional returns will be received for a considerable time, but I doubt the advisability of holding up the data received for these scattering returns.

Respectfully submitted.

W. M. STEUART, Director.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, December 29, 1921.

DEAR SIR: Your attention is called to the following resolution (S. Res. 192) passed by the Senate of the United States December 14, 1921:

"Resolved, That the Director of the Census be, and he hereby is, directed to ascertain from the ginners, for the period from August 1, 1921, to December 1, 1921, the total number of bales of cotton ginned by each ginner, the total weight of the cotton ginned, and the average weight per bale; and to find the average weight per bale of the total number of bales thus reported, and to report the same to the Senate as early as possible, such findings and report not to include linters."

Kindly answer the inquiries on the reverse side of this card and return it in the accompanying official envelope, which requires no postage. To insure that linters will not be included with cotton, they will be shown separately. I trust that you will give the matter your immediate attention.

Very respectfully,

W. M. STEUART,
Director of the Census.

UNITED STATES LANDS IN TEXAS ACQUIRED FROM MEXICO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2133) ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain lands or bancos acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico, which were on page 1, line 9, after "shall," to insert "upon the acceptance of this act by the State of Texas"; on page 1, lines 11 and 12, strike out "and of the respective subdivisions of said State of Texas, wherein said land lies"; on page 2, line 5, strike out "from" and insert "by"; and amend the title so as to read: "An act adding lands to the State of Texas and ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain lands or bancos heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

EXPORT OF COAL AND OTHER WAR MATERIAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 124) to amend Senate joint resolution 89, approved March 14, 1912, amending the joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal and other material used in war from any seaport of the United States, approved April 22, 1898, which were to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That whenever the President finds that in any American country, or in any country in which the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction, conditions of domestic violence exist, which are or may be promoted by the use of arms or munitions of war procured from the United States, and makes proclamation thereof, it shall be unlawful to export, except under such limitations and exceptions as the President prescribes, any arms or munitions of war from any place in the United States to such country until otherwise ordered by the President or by Congress.

SEC. 2. Whoever exports any arms or munitions of war in violation of section 1 shall, on conviction, be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

SEC. 3. The joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States," approved April 22, 1898, and the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to amend the joint resolution to prohibit the export of coal or other material used in war from any seaport of the United States," approved March 14, 1912, are repealed.

And to amend the title so as to read:

Joint resolution to prohibit the exportation of arms or munitions of war from the United States to certain countries, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments. The House substitute does not change the joint resolution substantially.

The motion was agreed to.

TRANSFER OF CERTAIN PUBLIC-LAND ENTRIES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1099) to amend section 2372 of the Revised Statutes, which were on page 1, line 10, to strike out the words "such entry shall, unless" and insert the word "if"; and on page 1, lines 13 and 14, to strike out the words "be reinstated and passed to patent; and in case the land has been so disposed of or appropriated."

Mr. SMOOT. The amendments merely clarify the meaning of the bill and have no effect upon the intent of the bill itself. I move the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented resolutions adopted by the Houston (Tex.) Cotton Exchange and Board of Trade, January 11, 1922, favoring the granting of sufficient appropriations to the Bureau of Markets and Crop Estimates of the Department of Agriculture to make more accurate cotton acreage reports, and, if sufficient funds be not granted to make proper canvass, that the source or sources of information be indicated by the department, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Hayward, the Chamber of Commerce of Pleasanton, and the Yolo County Board of Trade, all in the State of California, favoring enactment of legislation imposing a tariff duty on sugar imported into the United States adequate to protect and encourage the American sugar industry, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the California Teachers' Association, southern section, at Los Angeles, Calif., December 22, 1921, favoring the enactment of legislation creating a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

VISIT OF JAPANESE PARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, last year a delegation of the House of Representatives of Japan visited the United States. The Senate adjourned so as to be introduced to the party. I am now in receipt of a letter from the spokesman of the delegation extending thanks for courtesies received here. It is a very cordial letter. I presume the reason the communication has been sent to me is because I was a member of a congressional delegation which visited Japan two years ago. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, TOKYO,
December 15, 1921.

Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
2400 Sixteenth Street, Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

MY DEAR SIR: I have the pleasure of informing you that we, the delegates from the House of Representatives in Japan, who recently returned home after visiting the United States and Europe, desire to thank you heartily for the great courtesy you showed us during our stay in your country.

When we were in America, we found that most of the derogatory statements made in the past in regard to the relations between your country and Japan were based on misunderstandings, and we sincerely hope that those misunderstandings may be removed as soon as possible through your kind cooperation.

The statements we sent from America to Japanese newspapers concerning your kindness to us and what we saw while abroad created a good impression upon our countrymen. We are taking every chance to make the good impressions received by us while in your country known to our people, so that the bonds of friendship between the United States and Japan may be strengthened ever more and more.

In conclusion, I would say that we most earnestly desire the success of the Washington conference proposed by America.

Again thanking you most heartily for your kindness, we have the honor to remain,

Yours, faithfully,

R. NAKANISHI,
Spokesman for the Party of Members of the House of Representatives of Japan.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON NAVAL AFFAIRS.

Mr. POINDEXTER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5659) for the relief of Ellen M. Willey, widow of Owen S. Willey, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 439) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 7) to amend section 2 of the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution to authorize the operation of Government-owned radio stations for the use of the general public, and for other purposes," approved June 5, 1920, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 440) thereon.

Mr. PITTMAN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2390) to redistribute the number of officers in the several grades of the Supply Corps of the Navy, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 441) thereon.

HUDSON RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2799) to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890, and I submit a report (No. 442) thereon. The bill is recommended by the War Department, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have no intention, of course, of objecting to the consideration of the bill, but I am interested in the subject, and I desire to ask the Senator from New York whether the time for beginning the construction of this bridge has once before been extended?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Why is it that the construction of the bridge has not been commenced?

Mr. CALDER. Because the people who were given permission to construct the bridge were not able to finance the project, and, in addition, there were engineering problems which had not been overcome. It is now believed that all the engineering problems have been overcome, and if a permit to proceed with construction is now granted, the parties interested believe they will now be able to finance the project and to construct the bridge.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it a question now as to whether or not they will be able to finance the project?

Mr. CALDER. They now feel they will be able to finance the project. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] introduced the bill, and, perhaps, can give the Senator any information he may desire.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the nature of the corporation or the character of the people who are behind the proposition and who propose to build the bridge?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this bill provides for an extension of the time for building a bridge across the Hudson River from New York to New Jersey, a project the completion of which is greatly needed at the present time, in view of the congestion now existing by reason of the limitation of the capacity of the ferryboats plying between those two States. A group of financiers have gotten together and arranged to build this bridge under the toll system. It is proposed to be a bridge for vehicular traffic, for passengers, and also for railroads; a bridge that will be so vast in extent that it will require more steel in its construction than the entire five bridges which now span the East River from Brooklyn to New York.

The obstacle which has heretofore prevented the completion of the bridge has been the objection of the transportation companies to the location of the piers in the river as obstructing traffic. The present plans and designs, which have been prepared by Mr. Lindenthal, one of the greatest bridge builders of the country, contemplate piers on both shores of the river and a span across the entire 3,200 feet, with a 150-foot clearance. The bridge will be 2 miles in length. Certain financiers of New York and New Jersey have joined in an effort to build this structure which is so much needed. I have in my office, and will file in connection with the report, a description of the architectural plans.

Mr. NORRIS. Have the States of New York and New Jersey consented to the construction of the bridge?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that they have, for there is now a treaty between New York and New Jersey, and under what is known as the port authority those States are empowered to give permission for projects of this character.

I simply wish to say, Mr. President, that there is nothing so much needed at the present time to relieve the traffic and travel between New York and New Jersey as a bridge of the character contemplated in the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator whether this bill changes in any respect the original terms and conditions upon which the bridge was to be built?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It merely provides an extension of time within which the bridge may be constructed.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bridge would still be constructed under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers, I take it?

Mr. CALDER. It is specified in the bill, I will say to the Senator, that the plans must be submitted to and approved by the Chief of Engineers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, so amended as to extend the time for the completion of the said bridge until 15 years from the date of the approval hereof; and said time is hereby extended for said period: Provided, That this act shall not be construed as authorizing the building of said bridge in accordance with the plans heretofore approved by the Secretary of War, under which construction of said bridge was heretofore commenced, but drawings showing the new location and plans of said structure shall again be submitted to the Secretary of War for his consideration and approval before construction shall be again commenced: And provided further, That actual work hereunder and in accordance with such plans so approved shall be commenced within five years after such approval by the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. HARRIS:

A bill (S. 3014) to promote the safety of passengers and employees upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to use steel passenger cars under certain conditions; to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 3015) to authorize the erection and equipment of a building or buildings for school purposes on the Blackfeet Indian Reservation, in Montana; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. POINDEXTER:

A bill (S. 3016) for the relief of Pay Inspector Charles R. O'Leary, United States Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 3017) authorizing appropriations for the prosecution and maintenance of public works on canals, rivers, and harbors, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. SWANSON:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 156) authorizing the Secretary of War to grant a permit to erect and maintain a hotel upon the Fort Monroe Military Reservation in Virginia; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

INVESTIGATION OF COMMERCIAL WHEAT-FLOUR MILLING.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit a Senate resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 212), as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to extend its investigation of commercial wheat-flour milling from the date of the conclusion of its investigation of said industry included in its report to Congress on September 15, 1920, up to the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire whether or not the proposal will involve any very great expense and whether the commission is now investigating the matter antecedent to the period covered by the resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. It will require some expense, of course, but I presume the expense will not be great. In response to the other question the Senator has asked, and it is a very proper one, I will say that an investigation of this subject was made and a report submitted to Congress on the subject, I think, on September 15, 1920. The investigation, however, was closed before that date because it took some time to prepare the report. The resolution I have now introduced requests that the investigation be extended so as to include the fiscal year 1921.

Mr. KING. Can not the desired information be obtained from the Bureau of Markets or some other agency in the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not at this time. The resolution simply proposes that the investigation which the Federal Trade Commission has already made shall be continued up to the time they made their first report.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

PROPOSED BUREAU OF CROP INSURANCE.

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 214), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate the practicability and desirability of a bureau of crop insurance to be operated by the United States Government, or otherwise, as may be found advisable.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

Mr. KELLOGG submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 215), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the message from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State, submitting the report of the international joint commission on its investigation concerning the improvement of the St. Lawrence River between Montreal and Lake Erie for navigation and power, laid before the Senate and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations on January 16, 1922, be printed with all accompanying papers and illustrations as a Senate document.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed. In accordance with the order of the Senate, the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, is it the unfinished business that is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has something to say upon it.

Mr. HEFLIN. It will not take me more than four or five minutes to say what I wish to say.

Mr. CUMMINS. I had supposed that the Senator from Arkansas, who had the bill brought forward, intended to submit to the Senate some observations upon it.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—CORRECTION OF THE RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I want to make reference to an editorial from the Wall Street Journal concerning me that was printed in the RECORD yesterday at the request of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. It will not take me more than four or five minutes.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming has the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I do not wish to hold the floor against the special order or the unanimous-consent agreement longer than to present some views which I entertain and which I have stated I would present. I do not think I have a right to yield for anything that is likely to lead to a discussion, however.

Mr. HEFLIN. This matter pertains to me personally. It is in regard to an editorial which was slipped into the RECORD yesterday by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I knew nothing about it. It contains a criticism of me, and I want to make a statement regarding it.

Mr. WARREN. If it is a matter of a highly personal nature, I can do no less than to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes; it will take me only a few minutes.

Mr. President, just before Christmas, in a speech that I made to the Senate, I used the name of "the Wall Street Journal" when I should have said "the New York Journal of Commerce," and what I said applies not to the Wall Street Journal but to the New York Journal of Commerce. I had no intention of doing any injustice to the Wall Street Journal.

I have a letter from Mr. Wannamaker, president of the American Cotton Association, in which he says:

DEAR SENATOR HEFLIN: I have just read with a great deal of interest and pleasure your remarks concerning the attack made by the Journal of Commerce upon the South, and also the matter of the Federal reserve, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I wish to extend my personal appreciation and that of the entire South to you for your splendid stand in this matter.

He says:

P. S.: I note in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD you stated the attack was made by the Wall Street Journal, whereas you should have said the Journal of Commerce. Do not get the papers confused. The proper one is the Journal of Commerce.

Mr. President, I had no intention of using the wrong name. I certainly wanted to direct my remarks at the paper that was guilty of the things that I criticized. I am glad to make the proper correction in the matter, and will see that the permanent RECORD has the correction I have made.

I wish to say, however, that the courteous, the proper and the decent thing to have been done by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] before he printed an editorial reflecting on a colleague in this body would have been to have put the Senator upon notice that he was going to ask unanimous consent to have it printed. No Senator should attack another Senator through that sort of procedure. If he has anything to say he ought to say it on the floor, or let the Senator who is attacked know that he is undertaking to slip it into the RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the editorial which he is complaining about in the RECORD was read from the desk, or whether it was printed without reading?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think it was printed without reading. I knew nothing about it, and no Senator on this side knew anything about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Where is it?

Mr. HEFLIN. On page 1261 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. NORRIS. I judge from the RECORD to which the Senator calls my attention that it was not read from the desk, but was printed without reading.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. In the few remarks the Senator from New York made, he expresses his gratitude to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] for his speech on the Federal Reserve Board and its policy, and then later on prints this editorial in the RECORD without its being read.

I simply wanted to make that statement to the Senator and the country, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under the unanimous-consent order heretofore entered, the Senate has proceeded to the consideration of the bill requiring the issuance of mileage tickets by railroads. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] announced some days ago, I am informed, that he expected to submit this morning some remarks touching a very important subject, which, however, is not intimately related to the bill under consideration. At the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Wyoming, which I am very much interested in hearing and anxious that the Senate shall hear, I shall take the floor, if the opportunity is occasioned, and discuss the mileage book bill.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES—APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, a few days since I was interrupted in a brief statement respecting the report of an appropriation bill, which was the first of the great supply bills of the present session. These bills—one of which we have received, another has passed the House, and several others are under consideration there in subcommittees—are quite different in names and terms from those heretofore considered by Congress, and this is because of the Budget law, under which for the first time these bills are completely framed and presented.

THE BUDGET LAW.

It will be remembered that the necessity for a Budget law has been indorsed by both political parties in their conventions, and various bodies—chambers of commerce, boards of trade, and associations of various kinds—have seemed to make the entire Nation practically unanimous in its desire to have a Budget law, and to have the appropriations and expenditures of the Government conducted thereunder. At the time that the first bill was introduced and seemed likely to pass, the House changed its rules and placed all appropriation bills in charge of the general Appropriations Committee, and it handled the bills during the last session of Congress. It should be remembered, however, that they were not yet working under the Budget. In the meantime, after the Budget law had been passed at the last session, vetoed by the President, and reintroduced with the elimination of one or two objectionable clauses, it was passed in the first part of the present Congress; so that now we are up to a point where the House is thoroughly in line with that law.

The law provided that not only should the old style of estimates be made—the huge book of estimates which we have to ponder over in the committees every year—but there should be an alternative list of estimates, and in that alternative list should be set up a new line of treatment. That was adopted, and the House has used those estimates entirely. The result is that the bills came to us in economical terms, arranged differently, of course; but in the House the changes seem to have gained immediate approval, and there seems to have been more efficiency in considering and handling the bills.

Of course, under the Budget law the Bureau of the Budget spends the entire year in communications with the various departments, from the bureau chiefs up to the heads of the departments. It arranges what seem to be the wants of the Government in the way of appropriations. Then they are taken to the President, and by the President laid before the Cabinet, and either approved as a whole or changed by the Cabinet; and then the President becomes the one source from which we receive our estimates and our advices as to what should be done in regard to the expenses of the Government.

Without any intention, I wish to say, of infringing upon the rights or privileges of any Senator or any committee, and without undertaking alone to settle any problems existing under the adoption and the placing of Congress under the guidance of the Budget law and rules, I feel it necessary and, in fact, my bounden duty at this time, in carrying out the work that has been allotted to me by the Senate as chairman of the Appropriations Committee to present the advisability, if not indeed the necessity of certain changes of methods to coordinate our rules and practices and secure the best results expected from the operation of the Budget law.

HOUSE PRACTICE AMENDED.

As before stated, the House has assembled all of the appropriation bills in one committee. Whether or not the Senate will follow in the full acceptance and enforcement of the Budget thus made by the House rests with the wishes of this body. I bring the matter before you without any attempt at dictation on my part and shall accept the views of the Senate as my rule and the rule of the Appropriations Committee.

There is, however, a change in the titles and contents of appropriation bills as they will hereafter come to the Senate which will necessitate a change of our rules, and which I think should have attention without further delay.

SENATE RULE XVI.

For instance, under our present rules all general appropriations bills in the Senate shall be referred to the Senate Committee on Appropriations, as per the first paragraph of Rule XVI, except certain bills which are excepted by title, and which shall be considered by the respective committees for which the bills are named.

Some of those excepted have been, with others, done away with—absorbed in new bills under other names.

As I have said, the Budget law required the submission to Congress of the regular annual estimates in the usual old way, and it also required the submission of an alternative Budget estimate.

The alternative Budget estimate presented to Congress the estimates as required, but collected together and arranged in new and different forms.

NEW ARRANGEMENT OF APPROPRIATION MEASURES.

The Budget Bureau has proposed, the President has approved, and the House committee has adopted the new titles for the regular annual appropriation bills, as follows. I here quote the House record:

This arrangement necessarily will wipe out practically all of the old appropriation bills and establish in their stead new bills to contain the appropriations grouped according to the various units of organization of the Government. The following list shows the present bills and the proposed bills:

PRESENT (13).

1. Agriculture.
2. Army.
3. Diplomatic and Consular.
4. District of Columbia.
5. Fortifications.
6. Indian.
7. Legislative, executive, and judicial.
8. Navy.
9. Pension.
10. Post Office.
11. River and harbor.
12. Sundry civil.
13. Deficiency.

PROPOSED (12).

1. Treasury Department.
2. District of Columbia.
3. War Department.
4. Legislative establishment.

Permit me to say that that has no reference to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bills, except as it takes out the Senate and the House employees, and a few others.

5. Post Office Department.
6. Agricultural Department.
7. Interior Department.
8. Independent offices.
9. Navy Department.
10. Departments of State and Justice.
11. Departments of Commerce and Labor.
12. Deficiency.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. This scheme would abolish the sundry civil appropriation bill?

Mr. WARREN. Entirely. I will come to that in a moment.

This reduces the number of annual bills from 13 to 12, and it will be noticed that of all the bills heretofore cared for by the general Appropriations Committee, there is no longer a sundry civil bill, which, by the way, has been the most important of any of our appropriation bills; the omnium-gatherum of the sundry civil and other matters which relate, in a way, to all the different parts of our Government, much the same as does a deficiency measure.

Next to the abrogation of the sundry civil, the House will not send us the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. This is the bill that carried the employees of all departments, except Agriculture, from the President and the Congress on down through the line to the charwomen, and taking them all in except a few sundry services in the fields throughout the country and the more important employees of the Agricultural Department.

These become distributed among the various other bills, so that, as I said before, there will be no longer any legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

There is to be no fortifications bill as heretofore. This will leave to come from the House, directly under the old title, to the Committee on Appropriations only two measures—the District of Columbia and deficiency bills. Of those two, the deficiency bill is the only one that will come in the usual way, because the District of Columbia appropriation bill has been enlarged by adding the Supreme and Circuit Courts of the District of Columbia and sundry other matters which are considered to so relate to the government of the District as to be included therein.

Turning back a moment to the list which I have given, it will be found that not a single one of all the bills remains the same except the deficiency appropriation bill. Next to that is the Agricultural appropriation bill. There is very little added to that. The last three given in the list have been absorbed, the same as the three others mentioned, so that of six under their former names all have been absorbed entirely under these new names.

It would seem that under the present rules, if unamended, the Army appropriation bill would be sent to the Military Affairs Committee, the naval appropriation bill to the Naval Affairs Committee, the Post Office appropriation bill to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and the Agricultural appropriation bill to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as heretofore, and all of the others would be hanging in the air, except the one or two which formerly have been sent to the Appropriations Committee.

The things provided for heretofore have all been covered somewhere in these different bills, and the idea of the budget has been to so arrange our appropriation bills that when they become laws the seeker after information could find the subject he is looking for more nearly aligned with other similar things than if he had to hunt through three or four bills to find what would be appropriate for some one purpose.

For instance, the new War Department measure is made up very largely of matters formerly carried in the sundry civil bill, legislative, executive, and judicial bill, rivers and harbors bill, and fortifications bill, and it will be noted that this also carries to the War Department the construction, repair, and preservation of all the public works, rivers, harbors, parks, fortifications, and all works of defense, and from the sundry civil the following:

Armories and arsenals.
Barracks and quarters.
Fort Monroe, Va., wharf, roads, and sewer.
Military posts.
National cemeteries.
Antietam Battle Field, repairs, superintendent, etc.
Disposition of remains of officers, soldiers, and certain employees.
Confederate cemeteries.
Burial of deceased indigent patients at Hot Springs, Ark.
Arlington Memorial Amphitheater and chapel.
National military parks.
Buildings and grounds in and around Washington (payable wholly from the Treasury of the United States.
River and harbor contract work, including flood control.
California Débris Commission.
Survey of northern and northwestern lakes.
Harbor of New York.
Medical and surgical history of war with Germany.
Transportation facilities for inland and coastwise waterways.
National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers.
State and Territorial homes for soldiers and sailors.
Artificial limbs, trusses, and appliances for disabled soldiers.
Back pay and bounty.
Panama Canal.

Also all of the wages and salaries of War Department employees formerly carried in the sundry civil bill are transferred to the War Department bill. In the same way all of the department employees' salaries, contingent funds, and so forth, from the legislative, executive, and judicial bill. And thus the War Department appropriation bill becomes far the largest and most important of all appropriation bills—more important than several others combined—not only in amount of probable money appropriated, but in the vast number of distributions to be made of the money, and so forth. This bill, with all the others, comes from the one Appropriations Committee of the House.

The Post Office Department bill in the same way takes from the former legislative bill all of the department officers' and employees' salaries and contingent expenses. And, by the way, it might be well to record here that in contingent expenses for the different departments there should be experience and careful economy always, as well as in salaries of Government employees, in order to be sure that we do not pyramid one department upon the other in expenses, under the influence of the bureau heads and others, whose sole interest is with their particular branch of the Government service. We should somewhere, somehow, have all these expenses received and compared, one branch with another, and reconciled accordingly.

The Department of Agriculture will come to us more nearly in its old form than will any of the other supply bills.

It is true that we have, under the new title, what is called a legislative establishment, a bill which takes certain items from the old sundry civil, and also from the old legislative, executive, and judicial bills—things which apply more directly to Congress, like the expenses of the Senate, the House, the Library of Congress, Architect of the Capitol, police, drafting service, Committee on Printing, Senate and House Office Buildings, Capitol power plant, and so forth.

The District of Columbia bill takes from the legislative, executive, and judicial bill the courts—supreme and appeals of the District—and quite a number of items from the sundry civil bill.

The bill for the Departments of State and Justice takes all of the Diplomatic and Consular Service, and takes from the legislative, executive, and judicial bill all of the salaries of the two departments and their contingent expenses; salaries of all United States judges and all other court officers and employees, and contingent expenses of the Territories—Alaska and Hawaii. It carries the Supreme Court and circuit courts, retired judges, Court of Customs Appeals and Court of Claims, national park commissioners, books and papers for judicial officers, and so forth.

To give the Senate some of the changes brought about in this new arrangement of our supply bills, I beg to insert and have printed as submitted, in eight-point type, and tabulated and arranged as I present them, some statements which show in general terms the changes of which I have already spoken. I will not take the time to read them unless I am asked to do so, but a glance at the matter presented will show what is taken from other bills to make up the new bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Without objection, they will be incorporated in the RECORD.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Same as heretofore.

Mr. WARREN. Under this new grouping, and under the desire of Congress for economy and the desire to avoid overlapping, pyramiding, and duplicating, it is necessary, in my judgment, to have some reviewing authority, some committee, which may, at least, supervise matters to ascertain whether there have been such duplications as we are perfectly familiar with and have known about for years. We have known that ever since the committees were divided in the Senate it has cost the country more, each committee doing the best it could, but on account of the lack of some one reviewing committee we have spent unnecessarily many millions of dollars. I shall quote some of the expressions of those who have been with us in times past, and who have had intimate knowledge of these affairs. Before beginning that, I may say that it will probably be remembered by the Senators that Senator Aldrich stated to the Senate that, in his opinion, it cost $300,000,000 a year too much to run the Government because of the distribution of the appropriation bills among various committees.

DIVIDED AUTHORITY ON APPROPRIATIONS.

In the earlier years appropriations were all considered by one committee in each body, the Committee on Appropriations of the House and the Committee on Appropriations in the Senate. In fact, it was that way when I first entered the Senate. A few years later an unsuccessful attempt was made for division in the Senate, and I remember that I voted against it, although not then a member of the Appropriations Committee. Finally the House of Representatives made some divisions, the Senate followed suit, and the rules were changed, a number of bills—not so many as now—going to committees other than the general Appropriations Committee.

It was predicted, in fact it was known to be a certainty, as near as any future expected event can be a certainty, that this division would lead to great increase in expenditures of the Government, and if not actual extravagance, then surely to an unpreventable duplication and pyramiding of our expenditures.

ONE-COMMITTEE PLAN APPROVED QUITE GENERALLY IN PAST.

Distinguished Members of both Houses who have served upon these committees, and very many others—in fact, I may say almost all of those who have had to do with appropriation bills and who have served a sufficient length of time to enable them to pass judgment upon the matter—have maintained and insisted upon this view.

It is needless for me to go back beyond the memory of our oldest Members to name men of Senate and House who have expressed themselves on the floors of Congress in support of the one-committee plan, but I shall mention a few of the well-known Members whose judgment is entitled to our respectful attention.

I note from the RECORD that Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, of long and faithful service—never a member of the Appropriations Committee—speaking of a move to distribute the bills, strongly opposed it.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator say Senator Edmunds opposed the distribution?

Mr. WARREN. He opposed the distribution among the committees.

Mr. NORRIS. He wanted to retain them all in one committee?

Mr. WARREN. Yes. I will insert later exactly what these different Senators and others said. I do not wish to tire the Senate by reading them all, but will make them a matter of record.

Senator Sherman, not a member of the committee, said:

I believe it is necessary, as my friend from Vermont says, to bring all of the items of expenditure for the Nation under the eye and control of one committee, so that they may limit the amount of expenditure.

Senator Hale, a long-time member and former chairman of the Appropriations Committee, always strongly opposed separation.

Representative Randall, a member of the Ways and Means Committee, not of the Appropriations Committee, a noted economist and statesman, said:

If you undertake to divide all these appropriations and have many committees where there ought to be but one, you will enter upon a path of extravagance.

Mr. Tawney, a former chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, said:

Mr. Speaker, to my mind no other reform in the rules and procedure of this House is so essential to the future welfare of the people and to the economical appropriation and expenditure of their money for the public service as the consolidation of the appropriating jurisdiction of the House under a single committee of sufficient size to be representative of all sections of the country and of every branch of the public service. * * *

Senator UNDERWOOD, our distinguished colleague, took similar ground in the House of Representatives on February 6, 1915.

Representative Good made many speeches advocating a single committee, and a change in the rules of the House followed. This was while he was chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, and after they had had quite a long trial with their distribution as against the older plan of one committee.

Hon. James A. Garfield, when a Representative in Congress, said:

* * * I believe it would cost this Government $20,000,000 if the appropriations were scattered to the several committees. * * *

Hon. Thomas B. Reed, Speaker of the House, said, with regard to numerous appropriating committees:

The effect * * * will be to add to the expenses of the Government more than this rule (the Holman rule) ever saved.

And right here might be a good place to insert a quotation from the report of the Committee on Rules of the House, Forty-sixth Congress:

* * * It follows as a logical sequence that if any other committee is to take charge of one of the general appropriation bills the interest involved and considered will stand separate and apart from the interests involved and considered in the other bills, and as a further result any scheme of reduction of expenditures made necessary by a deficit of revenue for that fiscal year must be executed by the Committee on Appropriations without respect to the interests involved in the bill so taken from them, thereby leaving that particular interest to stand independent of and without any relation whatever to the other interests for which appropriations are annually made.

Representatives W. C. Whitthorne, of Tennessee; J. C. S. Blackburn, of Kentucky; J. Warren Keifer, of Ohio; Joseph G. Cannon, of Illinois; J. J. Fitzgerald,, of New York; Swagar Sherley, of Kentucky, and many others might be quoted, but I refrain from enumerating at this point, although I shall ask permission to insert very short extracts from the records containing remarks upon the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the extracts from the records submitted by the Senator from Wyoming will be printed in the RECORD.

The extracts are as follows:

Senator Edmunds—1866–1891:

I think it would be injurious to the interests of the Treasury and to the interests of the people who supply the Treasury of the United States to send appropriation questions for reports of sums to be appropriated to the various committees that have charge of the classes of the public service about which appropriations must be made, and that the practical result would be, if we divide them up, that the sum total of appropriations would be enormously increased. If there be a standing order of the Senate which says that all appropriations respecting the judicial establishment of the United States should be sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, the relations between the Committee on the Judiciary and the Department of Justice and the judicial establishment are of such an intimate and friendly character that we should be quite likely to be acting under a bias and to be more liberal in the money that we would recommend to be expended for the judicial establishment than a body of men not under such a bias would be likely to be. And I confess that I do not see any distinction between the matter of the District of Columbia and any other of the various branches of the public service—the Army, the Navy, Indian Affairs, post offices and post roads, public lands, and every one of the scores of separate subjects of public expenditure. I think that we should find in the main that the aggregate of public expenditure would be largely increased, on account of the necessary fact in human nature that committees charged with particular subjects and in direct communication with the particular branches of the public service get to be impressed with the ideas of the special departments with which they have to do, and feel with the departments that the public service would be better promoted with still larger appropriations to carry it on.

Senator Sherman—1861–1877; 1881–1897:

* * * I believe it is necessary, as my friend from Vermont says, to bring all the items of expenditure for the Nation under the eye and control of one committee, so that they may limit the amount of expenditure.

Senator Hale—1881–1911:

I know from my own experience that the tendency of the mind of a member of either of the other committees calling for appropriations each year—the Military or the Naval Committees, I will speak of the latter because I have had service upon that committee—is to gain all the power in appropriating money possible, and connected with that is the unerring result of desiring to have the power to appropriate more money. There has never been any exception to that. I think few Senators will dispute the statement that if all the business of the Committee on Appropriations was taken from it and given to the several committees we should then be confronted with a general scramble upon the part of each committee for more money. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Edmunds] urged that point much more forcibly and clearly than I can, and his experience, never a member of the Appropriations Committee but belonging to other committees here, taught him that.

Representative Randall—1863–1890:

If you undertake to divide all these appropriations and have many committees where there ought to be but one, you will enter upon a path of extravagance you can not foresee the length of or the depth of until we find the Treasury of the country bankrupt.

Representative Tawney—1893–1911:

Mr. Speaker, to my mind no other reform in the rules and procedure of this House is so essential to the future welfare of the people and to the economical appropriation and expenditure of their money for the public service as the consolidation of the appropriating jurisdiction of the House under a single committee of sufficient size to be representative of all sections of the country and of every branch of the public service. * * * This division of responsibility over the aggregate of the appropriations between eight committees of the House has year by year since its adoption * * * in 1885 resulted in an abnormal growth of public expenditures. As I have said before, ours is the only Government on earth which tolerates such a system of divided responsibility, the only Government which has established and maintains such a system of utter irresponsibility with reference to the initiation of authority for drawing draft upon the Public Treasury for public expenditures. This system, too, has begotten extravagance and a wide difference in the manner of authorized expenditures between the respective branches of the public service, a difference which is actually grotesque in its inequalities.

Senator UNDERWOOD (House, 1895–96; 1897–1915; Senate, 1915):

It is rarely the case that any body of men in a legislative capacity, except those who hold their commissions directly from the people, are willing to cut down public expenditures. On the other hand, the reckless expenditure of the public money has always been a cancer that in the end destroyed republics. Of course, we are far from that place to-day, but unless this House is willing to take action by which we can centralize the control of these appropriations and limit expenditures within reasonable amounts and cut out the reckless extravagances that sometimes are found in appropriation bills, I can see no place where the increased burdens of taxation on the American people are going to stop.

Representative Garfield (House, 1863–1880; President, 1881):

Let me state that the proposition to divide the Committee on Appropriations to scatter its bills as suggested, and as was once moved, indeed is, in my judgment, although I think it is not pending, an utterly ridiculous proposition. I believe it would cost this Government $20,000,000 if the appropriations were scattered to the several committees. * * * I do say, sir, without the slightest question in my own mind of the truth of the statement, that the scattering of these appropriations as suggested by the gentleman here will be absolutely breaking down all economy and good order and good management of our finances. It can not be otherwise.

Representative Reed (1877–1899):

* * * a large minority of the House are disposed to break down the work of that committee (Appropriations) and put a portion of it in the hands of several committees, the effect of which will be to add to the expenses of the Government more than this rule (the Holman rule) ever saved.

Representative Whitthorne (House, 1871–1883; Senate, 1886–1891):

When I first entered Congress, in the Forty-second Congress, Gen. Coburn, of Indiana, was a member of the Committee on Appropriations. He at that time proposed to divide the labors of that committee as is now proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Shallenberger] and by others. At that time I was heartily in favor of that proposition. But during all these years that I have been here my experience and observation have led me to believe that if we turn loose a half dozen committees upon the subject of appropriations it will be impossible to control the amount of these appropriations. I believe that it is for the interest of the people that the subject of appropriations should be committed mainly to one committee. I say this not out of any feeling with respect to my own committee, because if I considered that I should be jealous of its rights and should speak jealously of its intelligence and power of comprehending the duty before it. But, speaking in the interest of the people, in the interest of the Public Treasury, in the interest of the proper control of public expenditures, I may say, what has been forced upon me contrary to my original convictions, that it is the duty of this House to have the subject of appropriations controlled by one committee.

Representative J. C. S. Blackburn (House, 1875–1885; Senate, 1885–1907):

They (the committees) are appointed that they may guard the interests of the particular department committed to their care. That is the theory of the construction of the committees of the House; and it is a proper theory. The Committee on Appropriations stands in a very different attitude. Because of no special relation to any department, selected as a fair and impartial arbiter, with no more concern for the Navy or the Army than for the Interior Department or the Post Office Department, it has been selected as the one grand reservoir into which all these proposed disbursements of money should pour, in order that fairly, judiciously, impartially, it may make its recommendations to the House.

Representative Keifer (1877–1911):

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if you transfer to the various committees of this House the duties of preparing the several appropriation bills there will be a strife between those committees, * * * each striving to obtain the most appropriations for the department of the Government directly under its charge, and in that way we will necessarily augment the annual appropriations beyond the ordinary revenues of the Government.

Representative CANNON (1873–——):

Mr. Speaker, that change, in my judgment, based upon intimate knowledge and observation, has cost this country many, many millions of dollars in needless appropriations and expenditures. * * * No matter what the stress of circumstances may bring about in our national life now or hereafter, or how necessary it may become to apply the prunning knife, it can never be done without harsh and inequitable results through the medium of many committees as now provided under our House rules. I speak with deep and firm conviction in these premises, and after many years of somewhat arduous labor as a member of the Committee on Appropriations when it controlled all of the bills, both under Democratic and Republican Houses, and as its chairman when it controlled only a portion of the bills, and as a member of it under Democratic Houses under like conditions.

Representative Fitzgerald (1899–1917):

Years of investigation have convinced me that one change is essential in the methods of this House preliminary to any other reform. Unless this step be taken all other efforts at reform will be futile. It is necessary to return to the practice of the House during the first 93 years of the Union and to concentrate in one committee control of all of the general appropriation bills. The present method under which the appropriation bills are distributed among eight independent committees of the House is universally condemned by disinterested students of our Government.

* * * While such an illogical, unscientific, and universally condemned system prevails, attempts at reform will be futile and an effective remedy for the resulting evils is impossible. * * *

Representative Sherley (1903–1919):

When the estimates shall have come to Congress it is my belief that the House of Representatives should, through one committee, consider the estimates as a whole, and should recommend to the House the totals that should be appropriated for the various departments, and that that should be done without a consideration of all the detailed items that go to make up the total. Whether that shall be done through the creation of one committee that alone shall have the power to appropriate subsequently in detail the sums for the various bureaus or whether it shall be done through a committee that shall fix a limitation upon other appropriating committees is a question about which there has been a great deal of difference of opinion. My own belief had been that it was desirable under present conditions to create a committee composed of the various appropriating committees and, perhaps, if you desired it, of the authorizing committees, which should recommend to the House the sum total of moneys which should be appropriated, and when this recommendation was approved, either completely or by modification, it would then act as a limitation upon the power of each of the present appropriating committees.

In fact, many other distinguished Members of Congress have at sundry and divers times made speeches of considerable length and force, citing evidence and statistics to maintain their position that, in order to conform to a budget plan, to have economy of expenditures, avoidance of vicious or incessant duplications, and so forth, there should be but one committee in each body in charge of appropriations; and this became especially noticeable during the later years of Tawney, Hemenway, Fitzgerald, Sherley, and Good, as well as other chairmen who preceded them, in charge of appropriations in the House.

Thus far I have quoted only from the remarks of men who have served in Congress.

Now, I quote the opinions of three of our Presidents.

Former President Taft, in his testimony before the Select Committee on the Budget, commented as follows:

Now, you have spoken of the House committees, and, naturally, the Good bill does not deal with the House committees. I am bound to say that, under the old maxim that charity should begin at home, that is something that Congress ought to do for itself. In this matter of a budget, if there is any method by which any extravagance in Government expenditures can be expanded it is under the system you have in the House, because that same feeling that I have been describing in the bureaus and the departments that tends to magnify their relative importance inheres also in the making of appropriations of money by one committee for one department or for one branch of the service. A man does not have to be a Member of Congress to see that.

President Wilson, who, by the way, gave earnest support to the matter of a budget law, said in his address delivered at the joint session of Congress on December 4, 1917:

And I beg that the Members of the House of Representatives will permit me to express the opinion that it will be impossible to deal in any but a very wasteful and extravagant fashion with the enormous appropriations of the public moneys which must continue to be made, if the war is to be properly sustained, unless the House will consent to return to its former practice of initiating and preparing all appropriation bills through a single committee, in order that responsibilities may be centered, expenditures standardized and made uniform, and waste and duplication as much as possible avoided.

This, of course, was before the passage of the act.

President Wilson, in his message to Congress in 1919, said:

I hope that Congress will bring to a conclusion at this session legislation looking to the establishment of a budget system. That there should be one single authority responsible for the making of all appropriations and that appropriations should be made not independently of each other, but with reference to one single comprehensive plan of expenditure properly related to the Nation's income, there can be no doubt. I believe the burden of preparing the budget must, in the nature of the case, if the work is to be properly done and responsibility concentrated instead of divided, rest upon the Executive. The budget so prepared should be submitted to and approved or amended by a single committee of each House of Congress, and no single appropriation should be made by the Congress, except such as may have been included in the budget prepared by the Executive or added by the particular committee of Congress charged with the budget legislation.

President Harding, in his message to Congress on December 6, 1921, said:

In these urgent economies we shall be immensely assisted by the budget system for which you made provision in the extraordinary session. The first budget is before you. Its preparation is a signal achievement, and the perfection of the system, a thing impossible in the few months available for its initial trial, will mark its enactment as the beginning of the greatest reformation in governmental practices since the beginning of the Republic.

I ask to have printed at this point a résumé of the names and service records of the Government officials whom I have quoted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the same will be printed in the RECORD.

OLD GENERAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Turning back to earlier years, it is recorded that the first general appropriation bill providing for the expenses of the Government of the United States was embraced in the one act, approved September 29, 1789, which appropriated the total sum of $639,000, and covered only 13 lines of the printed statutes, as follows:

An act making appropriations for the service of the present year.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted, etc., That there be appropriated for the service of the present year, to be paid out of the moneys which arise either from the requisitions heretofore made upon the several States or from the duties on impost and tonnage, the following sums, viz: A sum not exceeding $216,000 for defraying the expenses of the civil list under the late and present Government; a sum not exceeding $137,000 for defraying the expenses of the Department of War; a sum not exceeding $190,000 for discharging the warrants issued by the late board of treasury, and the remaining unsatisfied; and a sum not exceeding $96,000 for paying the pensions to invalids.

Thus it will be seen, even with the total pension list which has become so great since, that they at that time felt that $639,000 was sufficient for the year's expenses, and I fail to find any record of a deficiency bill for that year.

The second general appropriation bill, approved March 26, 1790, was entitled:

An act making appropriations for the support of the Government for the year 1790—and provided for the expenses of the civil list, including the contingencies of the several executive offices, the expenses of the Department of War, pensions to individuals, all expenses arising from and incident to the sessions of Congress, the contingent charge of Government, certain demands existing against the United States, and other authorized expenses and payments therein specified.

This style of bill, with the same or similar title, continued until 1833, when the title was changed to—and under this title continued up to 1856.

Commencing with the fiscal year 1857, a change was made to provide for the objects usually appropriated therein, and three general bills were adopted; and the many changes from that time to this, and up to the present line of procedure, are all well known, I think.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator if in those times of which he was just speaking the fiscal year was the same as it is now?

Mr. WARREN. I do not believe that I gave that point any attention, but I assume that it was. Of course, the period would be 12 months in any case.

Mr. NORRIS. I know it would be 12 months, but it would be interesting to know. I never have, that I now remember, read about it or heard it stated whether the fiscal year always ended on the 30th of June, or whether in the beginning it corresponded with the calendar year, and, if so, why the change.

Mr. WARREN. I did not give that any attention.

SHOULD THE RULES BE CHANGED?

Mr. President, I have considered it my duty thus to bring the business of the Appropriations Committee of the Senate before the full Senate at this time, so that there may be no ambiguity as to what the budget law intends to effect.

In the House of Representatives appropriations matters seem now to be conducted with great harmony, expedition, and exactness; never as much so as in the present Congress, since the adoption of the alternative estimates and since the consolidation of all into one, and Members have become accustomed to the change.

Whether the Senate will join the House in its endeavor to make the budget law a success as a whole, conforming to the plan of one appropriations committee only, thus taking that route to secure its greatest success, or whether a halfway route—one-half budget and one-half nonbudget—is for the Senate in its wisdom to determine.

Undoubtedly the correct way—in fact, the only correct way—of working out the greatest success under the budget plan would seem to be for all appropriation bills to be built up carefully by the various subcommittees and passed upon finally by the one main full committee; and it is also undoubtedly true, in the event this course should be followed, that there could be drawn and added to the main committee members from the other committees, experienced in appropriations, thus enlarging to some extent the general Appropriations Committee.

However, these are all mere suggestions, and it is my purpose when I conclude my remarks to introduce a resolution proposing to amend the rule by providing that all appropriation bills shall go to one committee. I shall ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules, expecting, of course, that that committee will act upon its own information and belief. The resolution is designed to unscramble the grouping which has so changed the status from the old system.

Now, I suggest that this could perhaps be accomplished by adding to the general Appropriations Committee the chairman, or the chairman and one or two other members, of the present subcommittee of other appropriating committees—Members who have had much valuable experience in appropriation matters. That is to say, the work of appropriating committees is largely performed by subcommittees consisting of the chairmen and some of the other members. They, of course, have had experience which should be valuable in the future in connection with the consideration of appropriations.

The general committee would need to have and should have added to it experienced, able men, if not as permanent members, then surely as ex officio members.

As one studies the question it becomes convincingly apparent at every turn that there should be cool judgment and what might be termed a liberal but exact economy in providing for all our national expenses. A failure finally to compare the appropriations of one department with those of another and in some degree to submit them to the whole court at some stage of the proceedings may cause us to duplicate certain expenditures or indulge in careless extravagance.

I feel confident that the members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations stand ready with the chairman to undertake and carry forward successfully the whole line of appropriations, as is now done by the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives, if that be the wish and judgment of the Senate.

Always ready to do my full duty in the responsibility and work imposed upon me, it is not my desire to seek any further responsibility or work than the Senate of the United States wishes to delegate to me. But in whatever way we may approach the preparation and consideration of these bills there ought to be strenuous effort to make all the bills jibe and dovetail, as a carpenter would say, thus avoiding duplications and unnecessary expenses, not to mention possible extravagance.

Under our unrevised rules, all general appropriation bills except four, under the new titles, would be considered by the Committee on Appropriations, these four being War Department, Navy Department, Agriculture Department, and Post Office Department. The Agricultural appropriation bill will be in terms much the same as heretofore, but the other three will be greatly enlarged, as I have shown, from the legislative, executive, and judicial and other bills, more especially the War Department bill, which will embrace very much of the old sundry civil, legislative, fortifications, and all of the rivers and harbors bills, and others.

And while we await the pleasure of the Senate the Committee on Appropriations offers assurances that it will undertake to perform, as ably and promptly as possible, any and all duties that may be intrusted to its care.

When the question arises as to what committees may lose in the matter of jurisdiction over appropriation bills and what committees may gain in that respect, I will say that there is no committee which will be shorn of power to the same extent as will the general Committee on Appropriations, if the rules of the Senate are to remain unchanged. Of the four bills which I have mentioned which go to other committees, the fact is that under the new grouping of bills the measure providing for the War Department will contain several bills, three by name, which have heretofore belonged entirely to the general Appropriations Committee. Still I believe, notwithstanding what bill the proposed rule may take from one committee or another, that the grouping of the appropriation bills, as it is proposed they shall be grouped, if the idea is carried out exactly, as is now being done in the other House, so that all appropriation bills will be passed upon by some one authority, will be more satisfactory, and we shall get along not only faster but more economically with the transaction of our business. That is my judgment in regard to the matter, which, however, I humbly submit to my colleagues.

Mr. President, in order to bring the whole matter before the distinguished members of the Committee on Rules for their consideration, I shall now introduce a Senate resolution and ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Rules.

I wish to say that while the resolution is of some length, containing quite a number of lines, it embodies precisely the language of the rule as it now exists, except that it provides for the sending of all the bills to one committee, and leaves out the exceptions naming certain bills and the committees to which such bills have heretofore been sent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming desire that the resolution which he proposes may be incorporated in the RECORD as a part of his remarks?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be received, incorporated in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the proposed new rule read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution proposed by the Senator from Wyoming.

The resolution, S. Res. 213, was read and referred to the Committee on Rules, as follows:

Resolved, That clause 1 of Rule 16 of the Standing Rules of the Senate be amended so as to read as follows, to wit:

"1. All general appropriation bills shall be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or treaty stipulation, or act, or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session; or unless the same be moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or proposed in pursuance of an estimate of the head of some one of the departments."

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that the language of the proposed new rule is the same as the language of the present rule, except as to the first lines and the old exceptions.

Mr. NORRIS. Except as to the very first line, which refers all appropriation bills to one committee. Is that the only proposition to amend the rules the Senator intends to offer?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, in my judgment, if it should be concluded wise to distribute the appropriation bills to the various committees, it would, because of the new grouping of the bills, probably require another rule; but, on the other hand, should it be determined to send all the appropriation bills to one committee, I think it will be expedient to provide for additional members on that committee from the other committees.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point I was coming to, and I come to it without having any preconceived ideas. I am not sure but that it would be better to let the Appropriations Committee remain as it is now, because when a committee is made too large it becomes unwieldy. However, the Senator himself in his argument advocated, as I understood him, the enlargement of the Committee on Appropriations, but the proposed change in the rules which he has offered does not contemplate bringing that about.

Mr. WARREN. That would not be my province, and I merely offer that as a suggestion to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. NORRIS. It would be just as much the Senator's province as the province of anybody else. The resolution which the Senator has offered to change the rules proposes to send all the appropriation bills to the Committee on Appropriations, but does not enlarge that committee.

Mr. WARREN. No; it does not; and I wish to say to the Senator, and I undertake to say for the committee, that should all of the appropriation bills be sent to the committee without any additions to its membership, the bills will be taken care of and they will come to the Senate promptly and, in my judgment, in good form.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not disputing that.

Mr. WARREN. But, if the Senator will allow me further, I think it would be of service to the Senate to have the experience of the members of other committees which have been reporting bills appropriating money and who are familiar with the subjects matter of some of the bills, if any additional members are added to the general Appropriations Committee. When I say that I think all of the bills should go to the one committee I am simply stating what, I think, has been admitted almost universally. So far, however, as my position as chairman of the committee is concerned, I am not, I hope, such a glutton for work that I want to assume any additional tasks; but I should rather have the matter properly taken care of even if heavier labors were imposed upon the committee. On the other hand, I feel so interested in the subject, which has been under my eye for nearly 30 years, as to the manner in which the appropriation bills shall be handled that I believe the budget law will be incomplete and the action under it will fail in some degree unless, as I have remarked, we manage to have some one authority pass finally upon the appropriation measures. I feel so strongly about it that I would myself rather step aside and let the Senate provide an entirely new Committee on Appropriations, if they shall see fit so to do, and I should not ask any position at the hands of the Senate which they did not wish to place before me.

In this matter I realize that I may be considered as treading upon the toes of members of other committees. I know that the Senator from Nebraska, however, does not so consider it.

Mr. NORRIS. No, indeed.

Mr. WARREN. But I am giving my best judgment as to what the country ought to have. I shall be satisfied, of course, with whatever the Senate may do in the premises.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator does not get the idea, because I am taking an interest in this matter, that I am taking a position antagonistic to the one he takes.

Mr. WARREN. No; entirely the opposite. I thank the Senator for taking an interest in it. I appreciate it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I have an open mind. I am unconscious of any prejudice that I have on the subject. I do not know whether I should favor the proposed change or not, because it is a very great question, I think. I know that much can be said in favor of the Senator's position. He is probably right in thinking that one committee ought to do it all.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. NORRIS. I thought the Senator had yielded to me.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Is this an executive session?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the suggestion is well taken, and that Senators should speak a little louder, so that Senators in other parts of the Chamber can hear what is said.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator is alluding to me, I shall endeavor to make myself heard, although I am suffering somewhat from a bad throat. I will say to the Senator from Georgia, however, that I am sorry to say I am often obliged to ask somebody, when he is talking, what he says. This time I really did not hear him at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will let me conclude.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not want to interrupt. I thought the Senator was through.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am obliged to leave for a committee meeting.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I will yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wanted to ask the chairman of the committee whether he is presenting this matter to-day as a notice, under the rule, of his intention to offer this amendment to the rules?

Mr. WARREN. No; I am not presenting it now in that way; but I am asking that it go immediately to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think the Senator should present it.

Mr. WARREN. I am not moving to change the rules, except to put it in that shape. I have no objection to the other course, except that it might result in delay.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think it would result in delay at all, because I take it that the committee could not report an amendment to the rules without giving a day's notice, as the rules require. I think the Senator will be gaining time if he asks to have this treated as a notice of his intention to present an amendment to the rules, and then he can ask that it be referred to the committee to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. Very well, Mr. President; then I give notice that I shall present such an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised that the practice has been to refer such matters immediately to the Committee on Rules in any event, and that was done a few minutes ago.

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would be in order to take either course. The rules provide that a Senator can present his motion and give notice and have it read, and the next day he can offer it, and it does not have to go to the Committee on Rules at all; but the Senate would probably refer it to the Committee on Rules. Another way, I take it, would be that the Senator could have it referred to the Committee on Rules, as he has done. That seems to me to be perfectly proper.

Mr. WARREN. Whichever way may be deemed best by the Senate is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator whether he has made any inquiry from Members of the House of Representatives as to how this new rule has worked over there?

Mr. WARREN. I have.

Mr. NORRIS. What do they say?

Mr. WARREN. Not only have I done that but I have watched its operation very closely. They were not satisfied with it when first put into operation, because they were working under the old estimates, and those old estimates came up, as we all know, practically from the different employees—men drawing $2,000 or $2,500, heads of divisions. The department heads, the Cabinet officers, received those estimates, and they came on up through them. They sent them, for want of time, as I have explained, to the Secretary of the Treasury because the law required it. The Secretary of the Treasury confessedly gave them no attention except to send them forward. I quote the remarks of the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who, responding to an inquiry of mine soon after he came to the Senate as to whether these matters that came up for consideration had had the consideration of the Secretary, stated very emphatically that for want of time he sent them to us as they came to him.

Mr. NORRIS. That will not be true now, however.

Mr. WARREN. I was going to say that now, for the first time, we have the first bill that is really under the Budget system. It was given a day for debate in the House. The day was not all used. Then the next day it passed quite early in the day, and I think there were but one or two very slight changes. One point of order was made by the Member from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], which struck out the provision for an undersecretary of the Treasury, and there were one or two places where a little change of language by way of explanation was made; but the new rule has seemed to be very satisfactory. I met different Members, including Members who had been very skeptical theretofore, and they said, "Things are going mighty well under the Budget."

Take the Post Office bill; that was brought in one day and submitted to the usual course of debate. The next day I went over—I went over only once or twice to see how things looked—and just as I got inside the door the House adjourned, I should say a little after 2 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. NORRIS. They found out that the Senator was coming, I suppose.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; they do not have that respect for the Senate—not for me, at least.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not sure that the fact that they could get one of these big bills through in a day is any recommendation for the change, because that probably would mean that it was not given very much consideration.

Mr. WARREN. On the contrary, the hearings were very complete. The hearings were distributed and noted. When I speak of the readiness with which the bill was passed, I agree with the Senator that that means nothing of itself; but in talking with those who were not members of the committee, the other Members who take an interest in these affairs, I have yet to find anybody—there may be some, but I have yet to find anybody—who criticizes the bills as they are conducted now under the present rules. As the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] remarked a few days ago, there was some delay in the last session in the way bills came over here from this one committee; but they were gotten up under the old estimates, which, as we all know, were very incomplete, so far as giving the information we wanted was concerned.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 22 of the interstate commerce act is amended by inserting "(1)" after the section number at the beginning of such section and by striking out all after the first proviso of such section and inserting at the end of such section two new paragraphs to read as follows:

"(2) Each common carrier by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, within the continental United States subject to this act, shall issue interchangeable nontransferrable 5,000-mile tickets (including the privilege of carrying baggage free to the amount of —— pounds), to be sold at the rate of 2½ cents a mile, for transportation of persons on any lines of such carrier or any other such carrier, without regard as to whether the points of origin and destination for any single journey are within the same State. The commission, by order, (a) may initiate and establish such classifications, regulations, and practices relating to such tickets, (b) may make such regulation as it deems necessary for the enforcement of the provisions of this paragraph, and (c) shall modify the rate established by this paragraph, whenever in its opinion there is, after this paragraph takes effect, a substantial alteration in the average rate level for the transportation of persons by such carriers throughout the country as a whole, so as to increase or decrease such rate directly in proportion, as nearly as the commission deems practicable, to such alteration in such average rate level. Any ticket unused in whole or in part at the time of any such modification may be redeemed at the same rate per mile as that for which it was purchased. No common carrier shall demand, collect, or receive greater or less compensation for the transportation of persons or baggage under any such 5,000-mile ticket than that required by the provisions of this paragraph or any order of the commission issued thereunder; or refuse to accept any such ticket for the transportation of persons as provided in this paragraph.

"(3) If any provision of paragraph (2) or the application thereof to any person or circumstances is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of such paragraph and the application of such provision to other persons and circumstance shall not be affected thereby."

Mr. ROBINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the bill now under consideration is of very great importance and some controversies respecting the propriety or justification for its passage will arise during its consideration. I therefore hope that Senators who are interested in the subject will remain in the Chamber so as to avoid the necessity for the repetition of statements of fact and argument, to the end that, if possible, the consideration of the bill may be concluded within a reasonable, not to say a brief, time.

Mr. President, the demand for the issuance of mileage books for use in travel had become so great in the early part of 1921 that many Senators introduced bills upon the subject. Among those Senators may be mentioned the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], whose bill is now under consideration; the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. POINDEXTER (from his seat). I suppose every Senator will vote against the other Senator's bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is noted that the Senator from Washington remarks that every Senator will vote against the other Senator's bill. I hope that the matter will not take that course. I was about to say, before the humorous remark of the Senator from Washington just quoted, that these bills have a uniform purpose, but their provisions are in some respects quite different from the provisions of the bill now under consideration. It is my intention to explain briefly this measure and also to discuss what I believe will be its probable and reasonable consequences in relation to railway revenues.

The bill provides for the issuance of mileage books at the rate of 2½ cents per mile. The average rate for passenger fares, according to my information, is now 3.6 cents per mile. It is noticeable that the bill contemplates the issuance of these books at a rate substantially lower than the prevailing average passenger rates. I believe that it is 25 per cent less than the average rates now in force.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Arkansas ought to mention in that connection that the general level of passenger rates is 3.6 cents per mile.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have done so.

Mr. CUMMINS. But that does not include the surcharge made upon the tickets of persons who ride in Pullman cars.

Mr. ROBINSON. I intend to speak of that in the course of my remarks, and I intend to discuss briefly the times and purposes under which passenger rates have been greatly increased during the last few years. Now, however, I prefer to pursue the analysis of the pending bill.

This bill provides for the issuance of books in blocks of 5,000 miles. It has been suggested by many that there should be a substantial reduction in the mileage to be contained in the books. My investigations upon that subject have led me to the conclusion that the books should probably be issued in blocks of something like 2,000 miles; that this will not tend to a reduction of revenues, but will probably cause an increase in revenues.

Under this bill the unused portions of books, if any, are not redeemable, and the books can be used by the purchasers only. Later on in my remarks I expect to recur to these features of the bill. They are important and bear a substantial relation to the revenues.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator, I think, misstated one of the provisions of the bill; that is, that the unused portions are not redeemable. They are redeemable at the same price at which they were purchased. The bill reads:

Any ticket unused in whole or in part at the time of any such modification may be redeemed at the same rate per mile as that for which it was purchased.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the Senator will understand that the language he is now quoting relates to a very different provision from that which I am now discussing.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, yes; I see that.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Indiana, I take it, understands his own bill.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; I do.

Mr. ROBINSON. When his attention is called to it, he will readily see that the provision for redemption in this bill relates to a modification of the rate by the Interstate Commerce Commission in the event the commission finds a necessity for modifying the rate when it is considered in connection with rate levels and railway revenues.

I repeat my statement in order to make it clear, that under this bill, if the books are not used, or any portion of them is not used, or if they are lost, there can be no redemption, and that that provision bears a substantial relation to the subject of revenues. I think the Senator from Indiana agrees with me upon that construction.

The demand for this legislation in part grows out of the conditions which have arisen respecting travel under the prevailing high passenger rates. The bill does not make its benefits to any particular class of citizens. Any person who desires to do so is at liberty to purchase one of these books. The demand comes in large part from commercial travelers and their associations, manufacturing associations, jobbers' associations, farming organizations, theatrical and moving-picture companies, and, in general, organizations whose representatives travel a great deal.

Undoubtedly the principle upon which such legislation rests, and should be justified, is a recognition of wholesaling in transportation. I am not unmindful of the fact that some of the courts have stated in decisions that the principle of wholesaling is not recognized in the laws in connection with transportation. I have found no case, however, in which such a statement is more than obiter. Undoubtedly the principle of wholesaling is now and has for a long period been applied in connection with freight rates, and no reason can be assigned why it should be applied to freight rates and denied as to passenger rates.

Let us look for a few minutes at the recent history of mileage books in transportation. During the war in order to diminish travel and thus enable the Government, in the Federal operation of railroads, more promptly and efficiently to handle freight business, indispensable in the successful conduct of the war, the Director General of Railroads issued general order No. 28, embracing section 8, effective June 10, 1918, as follows:

No mileage ticket shall be issued at a rate that will afford a lower fare than the regular one-way tariff fare.

Mr. McKELLAR. What was the date of that order?

Mr. ROBINSON. The order was issued to be effective June 10, 1918. I have not the date that order was issued, but it was a short time prior to the date it became effective, and I think that is the material date.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it was issued on the 28th of May—at least some time during the latter part of the month of May.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that is correct. On August 2, 1918, passenger fare authority No. 26 was issued, reading in part as follows:

Carriers under Federal control, and their authorized agents, are hereby authorized to supplement tariff now in effect canceling the sale of all forms of mileage and scrip books effective August 20, 1918, such supplements to provide that outstanding tickets will be honored within limit, under conditions shown in tariffs under which sold, or will be exchanged for new scrip books containing coupons of equivalent value.

By that authority mileage books were canceled and their issue forbidden. As I have already stated, one of the important purposes upon which those orders were justified was the desire to reduce travel at that time rather than to promote it. So far as my memory goes, it was not related closely to the purpose of increasing railway revenues.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The order of the director general does not state the desire to reduce travel as a reason for the abolition of mileage books. I assume the Senator from Arkansas infers that from the general condition which then prevailed. I hope he will remember also that the increased freight rates which were put into effect at or about the same time were obviously for the purpose of increasing revenue. This order, as the Senator will remember, or an order issued about the same time, increased freight rates 25 per cent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, Mr. President, I think that is true. I know it is true that the order issued by the director general did not state any justification for the action in terminating the use of mileage books; but I am sure that neither the Senator from Iowa nor anyone else who is familiar with the transportation history of that period—and there is no one more familiar with it than the Senator from Iowa—will controvert the statement that the primary object of terminating the use of mileage books in transportation was to diminish travel, not to increase revenues. I shall have something to say a little later about the relation of the subject to the question of revenue.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not wish to be misunderstood by appearing to assent to the proposition just made by the Senator from Arkansas. It might have been very desirable at that time to decrease travel, but the director general increased passenger rates to 3 cents per mile throughout the country, and that increase was intended by him to produce the revenue which he thought he ought to have in order successfully to operate the railroads. I suppose that the abolition of mileage books was for the same purpose—the increase of revenue.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, increases in passenger fares under General Order No. 28 became effective June 10, 1918. All regular fares on railroads under Federal control which were lower than 3 cents per mile were increased to that figure. Commutation fares were increased 10 per cent. There was, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, a substantial and an important increase in passenger fares at the same time the order stopping the use of mileage books went into effect.

But I repeat that, in my judgment, the principal justification for the order terminating the use of mileage books was not closely related to revenues. It was more closely related to the desire of the director general to stop the public from traveling unnecessarily, so that some of the facilities which were used in passenger traffic might be used in moving troops, munitions, and supplies necessary for the successful conduct of the war.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator any figures showing the effect of the abolition of mileage books upon the revenues of the railroads?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and I shall discuss that in some detail a little later.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand the Senator from Arkansas to contend that while no reason was given for these particular acts, yet it is common knowledge to the Senate and probably to the country that the most important thing then required was to break up the congestion in railroad transportation in the country, so that we might reach the ports with the necessary war materials that had to go to Europe.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, yes; and it was also currently discussed that the people were traveling more than they needed to travel, and that something ought to be done to stop that, so that the things that had to be done might be more easily accomplished.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no way of ascertaining what was the object or purpose in the mind of the director general in increasing passenger rates. I have always assumed it was for the purpose of getting enough revenue to run the railroads, but if it was his purpose to decrease travel he failed signally, because from that time on until 1921 the passenger travel upon the railroads of the country advanced by leaps and bounds, so that there was more passenger travel in 1920 than there has ever been before in the history of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me that I may ask a question of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator from Iowa insist that there was any relation between those two things—the discontinuance of the mileage books and the increase in passenger travel?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think there was any relation between them, because passenger travel depends upon a great many other things than the mere rates which the passenger must pay. I am only saying that if it was the object of Mr. McAdoo to reduce travel, the increase of rates failed to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is true that in spite of the effort made to diminish travel, it continued. This was the result of the conditions which existed and the state of mind of the people. It was more or less the result of psychological conditions. The people were in a state of excitement and anxiety, and the natural result was that they wanted to move about. Then, of course, their movement was in many instances made necessary by the existence of war conditions.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. At that time were there not millions of soldiers in camp, and people who never traveled before went miles to visit their sons and daughters who were in the camps of the country?

Mr. ROBINSON. Undoubtedly. Thousands of women—mothers, sisters, sweethearts—and thousands of men—fathers, brothers, and friends—visited military camps, traveled long distances from the interior of the country to the embarkation points for the sole purpose of bidding good-by to soldiers who were going abroad to fight in foreign lands and perhaps never to return. But no one can dispute that at the time this order went into effect there was a well-understood policy on the part of the Federal administration of railroads to discourage travel where it was not necessary. The reasons for it I have already stated.

Let me turn briefly to a consideration of what I believe will be the reasonable effect of this legislation. First, it will tend to stimulate travel. The railroad executives of the country do not seem to realize that by the maintenance of both excessive passenger and freight rates business which ordinarily should be conducted on the railroads is being diverted to other instrumentalities.

Throughout the United States better roads are being constructed and thousands of commercial travelers and others in the course of their regular business are employing automobiles for traveling, and thousands of persons are receiving deliveries of freight through automobile trucks and similar means. The reason, in part, for it is that both passenger and freight rates are too high on the railroads. If freight rates were reduced to-morrow, judiciously reduced, intelligently reduced, it probably would promote more business and yield more revenue than the railroads are now receiving, and the same is equally true of passenger rates.

This diversion of traffic from railroads to automobiles and automobile trucks is a policy that is growing, and the railroads can only counteract it by doing something to invite and encourage the public to use their instrumentalities.

I wish to be frank. I am not a transportation expert and I do not think I am qualified to tell the Senate or anyone else just what will be the effect of a general increase or reduction in rates. For six months, under the order of the Senate, as a member of a joint commission of Congress I have been trying to look into that question. I know that thousands of cases exist where business is being discouraged, retarded, hampered, and hundreds of cases exist where it has been prevented by reason of the very excessive rates that are being charged by the railroads.

I know that thousands of traveling men in the United States, men who earn their living as drummers or commercial travelers, have left the road. Some drummers are traveling in automobiles and others are staying at home, for the reason that the passenger rates which they are now compelled to pay have discouraged their employers, and have induced them to adopt a restrictive policy in their business.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In many instances the rates have prohibited business.

Mr. ROBINSON. As the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] suggests, in many instances the rates have prohibited business. This condition is growing worse and will continue to grow worse unless something is done to relieve it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. As an illustration of the point the Senator from Arkansas is stating and stating so well, I wish to suggest to him that some time ago the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who is, as we all know, a large sheep raiser in Wyoming, said to me it was a strange thing that we were complaining of hard times down South when he could not for a reasonable price buy any cottonseed meal for his sheep in Wyoming. I said to him, "Senator, cottonseed meal is cheaper in Memphis, Tenn., at this time"—referring to the time when he was speaking—"than it has been since the year 1914, and there is no reason in the world why you can not buy cottonseed meal cheaply in Memphis, Tenn. I have just returned from there, and I happen to know the price of cottonseed meal." He said, "That may be true, but the freight rate from Memphis to Wyoming is considerably more than the price of the cottonseed meal in Memphis." In other words, the Wyoming market for cottonseed meal for sheep feeding purposes was absolutely closed because of the excessive freight rates.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the illustration just given by the Senator from Tennessee is forceful. Hundreds of similar cases were brought to the attention of the Joint Commission on Agricultural Inquiry, disclosing that the movement of commodities which has heretofore been reasonably profitable, and which was profitable prior to the installation of these excessive rates, has now become unprofitable, and that in many instances the freight charge equals the entire selling price of the commodity. That condition means, of course, if it is to become permanent, that the particular business referred to has terminated, for unless there is a reasonable hope that some profit will be derived from a business it will not be carried on.

Mr. CARAWAY. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. CARAWAY. Possibly the Senator has already alluded to the matter which I am going to suggest, but I do not remember his having done so. The people in the neighborhood of Hope, Ark., ship cantaloupes and other commodities. I remember on one occasion they shipped a carload of cantaloupes from Hope to Pittsburgh. The carload sold for $586.70, but after the freight and other charges were paid the growers received only $38.20. Oh over $10,000 worth of produce of one kind or another, including cantaloupes, beans, and other similar commodities, the average freight rate ran from 60 to 94 per cent of the total selling price of the produce.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, take the case of potatoes shipped from North Carolina to the Chicago market. In some instances from carload lots there was realized barely enough to pay the freight, and in other instances an entire carload lot of potatoes, when potatoes were selling on the market in Chicago at $2 a bushel, yielded but $30 or $60.

I do not believe that any Senator will controvert the proposition that there is a point at which an ascending scale of rates will diminish revenue. If passenger fares were 10 cents per mile instead of 3.6 per mile as now, the revenues from passenger fares would probably be much less than the amount which is now received. I have before me a statement of the revenues received from passenger fares on all class 1 railroads in the United States during every month, beginning January, 1915, and I am going to put that statement in the RECORD. I take the position that the increases in passenger rates to which I am about to refer have not materially increased revenues but in all probability have diminished them.

I have already referred to the increases that were made under the director general. After the Federal administration of railroads had substantially expired there was issued "Increases under ex parte 74," which took effect August 26, 1920, according to which all passenger fares were increased 20 per cent and a surcharge upon passengers riding in sleeping cars and parlor cars amounting to 50 per cent of the rate charged for space in such cars was authorized, and those increases are still in effect. The average rate that a person traveling now pays is 3.6 cents per mile.

I wish to make a comparison now between the revenues under the rate when the average was 2.6 per mile and the revenues under the rate when it became 3.6 per mile. As the Senator from Iowa has suggested, these figures are not conclusive of the point I am seeking to make; a great many circumstances properly enter into the consideration of the question, and I do not think it is possible for anyone to say that the analogy which I am drawing is a conclusive one; but during the first half of 1920 the total revenues from an average fare of 2.6 cents per mile were $564,586,242, while during the first half of the following year, after the order to which I have referred, granting a 20 per cent increase and providing for a surcharge on the fares of those who ride in Pullman or parlor cars had gone into effect, the revenues were $573,254,211, or an increase of only a little over $8,666,000, notwithstanding the rate had been increased on the average from 2.6 cents per mile to 3.6 cents per mile.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator state how many increases in passenger rates per mile there have been since 1915?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have referred to the increase made by the director general.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; amounting, as I understand, to about 20 per cent?

Mr. ROBINSON. And to the surcharge, and the increase of 20 per cent made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think that is all. The increase made by the director general, which was in effect for a time, was an increase to 3 cents per mile during the period it was in effect.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I was going to suggest to the Senator, in connection with the table which he has introduced showing the revenues from passenger service received by class A railroads, that he also show what increases have been made in passenger rates per mile from 1915 up to the present time by such railroads.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated all the general increases with which I am familiar. The figures with which I am dealing in connection with the point which I am attempting to make relate to the changes that have occurred under the present high rates. I take the figures beginning with the year 1920 when the rate was 2.6 per cent and compare the earnings for the first half of that year, when that rate prevailed, with the earnings for the first half of the next year when the higher rate of 3.6 cents prevailed, and I show that the difference in revenue was only about $8,666,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator has made that clear.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think there is a little confusion—at least there is in my own mind—in regard to the figures just given by the Senator from Arkansas. I will ask him whether this is not the exact situation: During Federal control the rates were 3 cents per mile; that is, those were the maximum rates?

Mr. ROBINSON. That order went into effect June 10, 1918.

Mr. CUMMINS. It went into effect in June, 1918; but when the Senator speaks of a rate of 2.6 cents per mile he speaks of the actual revenue—that is, the average of the rates actually charged and the money actually received by the railroad companies.

Mr. ROBINSON. When I speak of 3.6 cents per mile the same rule applies.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is the confusion. When the Senator speaks of a rate of 3.6 cents per mile there is the same disparity between that general level of passenger rates as there is between 2.6 cents per mile and 3 cents per mile. The railroads have not actually received upon the average 3.6 cents per mile.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; they have; that is the point I am making.

Mr. CUMMINS. I venture to say that the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. ROBINSON. Well, of course, I can not testify as to what the books of the railroads show, or anything of that sort, but in the first half of 1920——

Mr. CUMMINS. I have a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission on that very point, and at the proper time I think I can convince the Senator from Arkansas that the railroads have not actually received 3.6 cents per mile.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is the average rate charged.

Mr. CUMMINS. So was 3 cents a mile the average rate charged during the other period.

Mr. ROBINSON. All ordinary passenger rates below 3 cents were raised to that figure.

Mr. CUMMINS. But it resulted in the railroads only receiving 2.6 cents per mile.

Mr. ROBINSON. I now understand the suggestion of the Senator; unquestionably there would be a discrepancy between the average rate and the actual rates as to revenues; but the discrepancy does not apply with great force to the point I am making, because the average rate for the first half of 1920 is compared with the average rate for the first half of 1921, and the difference probably would apply to the one as well as to the other.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. I was not disputing the conclusion which the Senator from Arkansas was drawing from the facts, but I wanted the exact relation between the rates in these two periods to be borne in mind; and I should like to say a word, if the Senator will permit me, with regard to a statement he made a moment ago.

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. So far as I am concerned—and I think what I say would be the judgment of every man who knows anything about this subject—there is a point which measures the maximum producing qualities of a railroad rate, whether freight or passenger; and if the rate is advanced beyond that point, the result will be a lessened revenue instead of an increased revenue.

The position I take with regard to this particular bill is that the Interstate Commerce Commission is the best judge with regard to that point, and where the line should be drawn. It is charged with that duty, and it exercises its jurisdiction after hearings and notice and after full information; and it has said that the rates which now prevail are at the point at which they will produce the maximum revenue. I, for one, do not feel like reviewing the action of the Interstate Commerce Commission and insisting that it is less qualified to enter a judgment upon this question than the Congress of the United States, which must necessarily act with very inadequate and imperfect information.

I wanted that to be made perfectly clear before the Senator proceeds further. I agree with everything that the Senator from Arkansas has said.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am very happy in that information, Mr. President, because that simplifies what appears to be my task, and I thank the Senator for his interruption.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield; but I do not want to be diverted from the statement of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to refer to a part of his statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. All right.

Mr. NORRIS. I wondered if the Interstate Commerce Commission takes the position that it is its duty to retain rates on the railroads at a point which shall be absolutely the maximum revenue-producing point; and does the Senator from Iowa take such a position?

Mr. ROBINSON. Let me answer the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. It has not done anything of the kind, and I was just about to say to the Senator from Iowa that his declaration to that effect was an inference that is not justified by the facts.

Now, what are the facts?

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. ROBINSON. Just let me have a little of my own time, and then I will yield. The Interstate Commerce Commission has not determined the question; it now is considering the reduction of rates. Does the Senator from Iowa mean to imply that it has decided to maintain the maximum revenue-producing rates and not to lower existing rates? I do not think the Senator meant that inference.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I said nothing even to suggest that inference. The Senator from Arkansas was arguing that a reduction in passenger rates would increase the revenue of the railroads—I assume he means the net revenue of the railroads—and he said that there was a point beyond which increased rates would result in a lessened revenue, and I agree to that; but I said that the Interstate Commerce Commission is a better judge of that point than the Congress of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the Senator also said, if I may interpolate, that the Interstate Commerce Commission had decided that the present rates were the rates which would produce the maximum revenue.

Mr. NORRIS. And that is what brought about my inquiry.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; and the commission has not decided any such question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Arkansas if I said any such thing.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator certainly said it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not intend to say it. This is a paraphrase of what I intended to say:

In August, 1920, the Interstate Commerce Commission, having considered after a long and arduous hearing the whole railroad situation, advanced the rates to the point which has been named by the Senator from Arkansas because in the judgment of the commission the railroad companies were entitled to and must have the revenue which these rates would produce. If the Interstate Commerce Commission had been of the opinion that lower rates would have produced the revenue to which the railroads were entitled, the rates would have been fixed at a lower point. Therefore, if any mistake has been made, it is the mistake of the Interstate Commerce Commission in believing that lower rates than now prevail would not have produced the revenues to which the railroad companies are entitled.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is entirely conceivable, from facts within the knowledge of all of us, that under the circumstances the commission might have made a mistake; and, indeed, I believe a mistake has been made.

What are the facts? At the expiration of Federal control and prior to this order the railroads filed their new schedules for new rates to go into effect. It was known that they required additional revenues. The commission adopted the tariffs proposed and permitted them to go into effect. The matter has been under experiment. I am maintaining that if the rates had been fixed upon a somewhat lower basis, both as to freights and as to passengers, the revenues likely would have been greater, and I think I am prepared to show that by figures. I have already referred to the fact, and other Senators have mentioned it, that much business has been prevented by reason of the alleged excessive rates charged. Would it not have been better to permit that business to continue and to develop under slightly lower rates, rather than to destroy the business?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. Just one moment. In the case of passenger rates, if thousands of men have been driven from the railroads to find new means of travel, and thousands of others have been kept at home, by reason of the high rates, would it not have been more profitable to the railroads, instead of running empty trains, as they are now doing throughout this country, to have filled their trains with passengers at somewhat lower fares?

I now yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has just stated what I was about to suggest—that whether or not a railroad is prosperous depends upon the volume of its business quite as much as upon the rates fixed.

Mr. ROBINSON. And if it operates under rates that constantly diminish the volume, no matter how high the rates are, it may reduce its revenues.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course that is axiomatic.

Before I revert to the statement of the Senator from Iowa let me state that in going home from Washington to Little Rock, Ark., I have found the Pullman cars, which were crowded beyond their capacity prior to the installation of the present rates, since have been half filled to the point of St. Louis. Going from St. Louis south and southwest I frequently have enjoyed the privileges of a private car, few others riding in them, and principally for the reason that the rates have been made so high that the people will not pay them.

There is not a Senator here who travels who does not know that the great trains that come thundering into the station in this city are coming with their parlor cars and their Pullmans half filled now. The passengers on a train that entered this station over one of the big lines a few days ago were counted, and there were scarcely a hundred. Would it not be more profitable to that railroad and to every other railroad, instead of operating these cars partly empty at the same cost that it would require to operate them when filled, to put into effect rates that would invite travel, and thus secure additional fares?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to give an illustration of the operation of these excessive rates, as one illustration is generally worth an hour's argument.

After our recess a relative of mine, my brother, who had unfortunately very suddenly lost his sight, had to come to Washington for treatment. I therefore engaged the drawing-room from our home to this place. Prior to any increase in the rates the price of the drawing-room from Lynchburg, S. C., to Washington was something like $9.50. We paid from that point to this city—about 460 miles—$19 and the major fraction of a dollar. The surcharge of 50 per cent on the regular charge amounted to something like $6.50, in addition to the thirteen or fourteen dollars that was charged as the regular rate, and that was after the war tax had been deducted.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, supplementing the illustration of the Senator from South Carolina with one of my own, I recently traveled with my family from Little Rock, Ark., to Washington in a drawing-room, and I paid $44 and 90-odd cents for the drawing-room space.

Of course, Senators may answer that I had a remedy—to go out and ride in a day coach, or on top of the cars, or on the rods, or I could have come by other means of transportation—but the point to the proposition is that the railroads would make more money if they charged a reasonable fare for such services, and that the fare now charged is unreasonable.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, would the Senator have gotten a reduced rate on top of the car if he had ridden that way?

Mr. ROBINSON. I might have been in a better financial if a worse physical condition if I had resorted to that elemental method of travel.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to get back to the evidence that the increase in rates in the latter half of 1920 did not show a proportionate increase in revenues. I am not saying that that is proof; I say the evidence, whatever weight it has. I should like to have the figures again.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am glad the Senator from Nevada suggests that. I had prepared to make a consecutive statement regarding those figures. I was diverted from it. I will make the statement again.

In the first half of 1920, when the average passenger rate was 2.6 cents per mile—although that was not the actual fare paid, as suggested by the Senator from Iowa—the revenues were only $8,666,000, less than they were in the first half of 1921, when the average fare paid was 3.6 cents per mile, or a cent per mile more than in the first period with which it is compared; although in the latter case, as in the former case, the average fare, of course, can not represent the actual fare, and these figures are used only for purposes of comparison. I want to show, further, the effect of those rates on travel.

Mr. PITTMAN. Permit me to ask a question before the Senator goes to that. In other words, the increase of approximately 25 per cent in rates made an approximate increase of only 1 per cent plus in revenue. I think it figures out approximately that.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Nevada can make the calculation. I will be glad to have him do so.

Mr. PITTMAN. I think that is approximately true.

Mr. ROBINSON. That enforces the proposition I am making. Carry this comparison further. I said these rates were now so high that they discourage travel. The comparison I am making proves that. While the revenues for the first half of 1921, under the high rates I have already described, exceeded the revenues for the first half of 1920 by $8,666,000 plus, the number of fares paid was approximately $73,000,000 less in the first half of 1921 than in the first half of 1920. The number of fares paid in the first half of 1920 was 595,771,000. The number of fares paid in the same period of 1921 was only 522,195,000, or more than 73,000,000 less, tending to show that these rates did discourage travel very greatly.

In addition to that, not only were the number of fares sold under the high rate greatly diminished, as I have just shown, but the average journey traveled under the new and high rates for the first half of 1921 was only 35.4 miles, while the average journey under the lower rate in force in the first half of 1920 was 36.41 miles.

I have referred to the receipts from passenger fares by first-class railroads in the United States throughout the period beginning January 19, 1915, and extending to the end of the month of November, 1921. The December figures have not yet become available.

I have a statement showing these revenues by months. This statement not only reflects the passenger fares collected and their relation as between the higher and the lower rates, but there are also figures relating to freight, mail, and express, and while I have not examined the latter three thoroughly, I am going to put them into the RECORD. In general, the conclusion seems warranted that the same or greater revenues might be obtained if the rates were judiciously reduced. Of course, I do not mean that you could reduce them arbitrarily or on a percentage basis and produce that wholesome result. In that connection I admit that such work is for the Interstate Commerce Commission. Congress can not do it; but I propose to show in a few minutes why the Senate can intelligently act upon this proposition and why it need not refer it to the commission.

Mr. SMITH. Before the Senator makes his legal argument in reference to that I want to ask him if, in the tables which he has, there are any figures showing the increased revenues from all sources resulting from the change in rates, as compared with the prewar rates?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I go back to January, 1915.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, I was led to ask that question because while chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate, just before the railways were turned back, or near the conclusion of Government control, I asked what increase there was in the revenues or the tariffs paid by the people by virtue of the flat raise, both in freight and in passenger rates, as compared with the tariffs on the same tonnage under the old rates, and the reply was that it was something in excess of a billion dollars. That meant an additional tax on the traveling and shipping public of something in excess of a billion dollars.

Subsequent to that there has been an increase of about 40 per cent, I believe, if I am correct, in the freight charges, and a like increase, or greater, in the passenger charges. It was from about 3 cents to about 3.6 cents, about 25 per cent increase.

Mr. CUMMINS. The increase of the passenger rates after the roads were turned back was an increase of 20 per cent, with a surcharge for those who traveled in Pullman cars.

Mr. SMITH. The point I want to make is that if the additional expense to the traveling and shipping public was in excess of a billion dollars under the first rate, this addition must be something like two billion dollars, because I remember that the fractional part of the billion was perhaps the major fraction of a succeeding billion. Adding that to this surcharge, and the 20 per cent raise in the passenger rates and in the freight rates, we find it has decreased passenger and freight rates, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, but still imposes something in excess of the prewar revenue of approximately $2,000,000,000.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator from Arkansas a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; I yield, if it is related to the subject I am discussing.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does not the Senator recognize that there are other conditions which affect passenger travel than the rate charge?

Mr. ROBINSON. I so stated, and I stated that the figures I am using are not conclusive on the subject. They are merely persuasive. I made that statement in the beginning.

Mr. CUMMINS. I wanted to have that statement made to satisfy my own mind about it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Reverting for a moment to one feature of the topic, as discussed by the Senator from South Carolina, let me give a few figures on freight for the same comparative periods; that is, the first half of 1920 and the first half of 1921. The total freight revenues for the first six months of 1921 were $1,863,836,308, as against $1,860,948,323 for the first half of 1920. The difference in freight earnings under the higher rates prevailing in the first half of 1921 and those of the first half of 1920 was less than $3,000,000.

How does the tonnage compare? Senators will see the force of the point I am attempting to make when I cite the figures. Tonnage, like passenger travel, dropped. The tonnage in the first half of 1920, the same comparative period, was 1,020,118 tons. In the first half of 1921, under the exorbitant rates which were then and are now being charged, the tonnage dropped to 779,360 tons.

As in the case of passenger fares, all of the facts and circumstances existing at the time concurred in producing this disparity, but in six months under low rates for freight the railroads received almost as much as they received in a similar period under the enormously increased rates, and at the same time their business dropped from more than 1,000,000 tons to 779,000 tons, plus.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They dropped about 25 per cent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Approximately 25 per cent. I maintain that if freight rates were reduced judiciously and promptly the tonnage would be so greatly and so rapidly increased that the revenues would exceed the revenues that are now being received, and the great and wholesome benefit that would come to this Nation in the stimulation and revival of business and prosperity can not be estimated.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURSUM in the chair). Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The objection I have to this legislation is not that I feel that the rates ought not to be reduced, because I think they should be, just as the Senator has been contending. The objection I have is to establishing the precedent of having the Congress of the United States fix rates. What I rose to say was bearing out the Senator's theory that a reduction will increase traffic. I can give the Senator a concrete illustration from my own State.

About 15 or 16 years ago the legislature of Ohio passed what was known as the Feiner law, which reduced passenger rates from 3 cents to 2 cents per mile. It was contended that that legislation would reduce the revenues of the roads. The report of the State railway commissioner for the year following showed that the revenues at a 2 cents per mile rate in that State exceeded what they were the preceding year when the rate was 3 cents.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is a wonderfully apt illustration.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand the position of the Senator from Ohio to be substantially the same as that of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. POMERENE. I did not hear the statement of the Senator from Iowa in full. I think it would be unfortunate if we should establish a principle of this character, because if we do, somebody will come in wanting rates established for iron and steel and every other commodity that is shipped. That is the difficulty about it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator from Arkansas deal with that aspect of the situation later?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am coming to that almost immediately. I believe that there is a general consensus of opinion in the Senate, among those who have attended this discussion, that if the railroads desire to increase their operating revenues they may better and more easily accomplish that end by a substantial and judicious reduction of both passenger and freight rates than by the maintenance of the present rates unmodified.

I am going to print in the RECORD, with permission of the Senate, the statement to which I have referred, showing by months the revenue from passenger fares tending to sustain, in the main, the contention that the present rates are so high as to discourage in many instances and to prevent in others the conduct of business that is necessary and that ought to be carried on. I would like to print that statement without further comment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I come now to a consideration of the position taken by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and, as I understand it, by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], that this is a matter which the Interstate Commerce Commission is peculiarly qualified to determine and that the commission ought to be permitted to decide it.

With the general proposition that legislatures can not successfully fix transportation rates, I am in hearty accord. We do not possess the information nor the agencies necessary successfully and intelligently to perform such services. I wish to be entirely frank with the Senate. If I thought the commission would act and act promptly upon the matter I would have no objection to referring it to the Interstate Commerce Commission. But I am advised that the commission have had this matter under consideration for several months, and they stand approximately evenly divided on the question of policy. They now, in my opinion, have the power to authorize the issuance of mileage books in the exercise of their general power to fix just and reasonable rates.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator think they have the power to compel their issuance?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not know. I think they have the power to fix the rate at which the books shall be sold.

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; if the railroads made application; but suppose the commission initiated the matter?

Mr. ROBINSON. The commission can initiate rates. The commission has the full power in the matter now if it finds a necessity for it. In the exercise of its general power to initiate and fix just and reasonable rates it can fix any rate that it regards as just and reasonable.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest that the difficulty on that point—and I submit it to the Senator from Arkansas—is that while the commission has the power to initiate rates it has no power to compel one railroad to recognize or accept tickets issued by another railroad unless a joint route is established and unless a joint rate has been promulgated. That is the way I understand its power.

Mr. ROBINSON. They have the power to promulgate the general rate, which is the same thing in the end, if they choose to exercise it. The difficulty about the matter is this: The commission are overburdened with duties. They are performing very important and very difficult functions. They have been unable to reach an agreement respecting this subject. Merely to authorize the commission to do something which many think they have the power already to do if they chose to exercise that power, would not be accomplishing very much. But conceding that the commission may not without legislation require the issuance of mileage books, an objection grows out of the fact that great delay will ensue if the matter is relegated to the commission. I do not believe any step Congress can take will more quickly and more vitally restore courage, enthusiasm, and interest among the people of the country in their business affairs than the passage of legislation of this character. It is not a question of general rate making, although, of course, the effect of our action here must be considered in relation to the broader and even more important question of revenues to railroads generally.

It is a comparatively simple matter. If the rate fixed in the bill, in the judgment of the Senate, is too low, if the Senate thinks that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] in preparing the bill and fixing the rate at which the mileage should be issued at 2½ cents per mile acted unwisely and that the rate ought to be increased, we can do it. We have sufficient intelligence and information respecting the subject to wisely determine it. I think the rate is about right. The enactment of this legislation will have a wholesome effect. I do not see the slightest necessity for throwing it into the Interstate Commerce Commission, where we know there is such a division of opinion respecting the policy involved in the legislation and probably its relation to revenue that no action is likely to result if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is agreed to.

I wish to see something done that will revive the business of the country. Nothing has contributed more to the present depressed state of business, to the dimunition of the number of sales, to the loss of profits, and the maintenance in many localities of excessive prices than have exorbitant railroad rates. We have to meet this question. The courts in every decision have said that rate making is a legislative function. If we want mileage books issued, we have the power to require their issuance, if any power can require it. There is no reason why the Senate can not intelligently determine the very simple questions involved in the bill. The commission is authorized to modify the rate if that is found necessary.

Mr. President, I have profound regard for the judgment of the Senator from Iowa. In my opinion he is perhaps the best-informed man on transportation questions in the Congress of the United States. I have not only confidence in his judgment but unlimited confidence in his integrity. I am looking at this question from the standpoint of the business interests of the country generally as well as from the standpoint of the interest of the railroads. I think my record in the Senate has demonstrated beyond necessity for vindication on my part willingness to support and advocate legislation that would put the railroads of the United States on a secure basis and enable them to operate profitably.

I have no hesitancy in saying that I have been disappointed with the manner in which the transportation act has been applied through the instrumentality of the railway executives. Their policies in some particulars have depopularized the very liberal rule of rate making prescribed in that act. They ought to have gone forward in the carrying out of the act in a way that would draw to the railroads the confidence of the people whom they serve. Necessarily many rates in the new tariffs quickly proved the necessity for corrections. Railroad authorities have been slow to make them, slow to make any concessions. For fear of establishing precedents that might later rise to plague them they have stood still when they ought to have advanced.

I indulge the hope that the Senate, having full knowledge of the subject, will enact this legislation, and do it by an overwhelming vote.

There is nothing further that I can say now that will clarify the issue presented by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. The power exercised in this bill is a legislative power. It is our right to exercise it if we can do so intelligently. The proposition involved is simple. Any Senator can understand it. Why, then, delay action by sending it to the Interstate Commerce Commission, whom we know to be so divided upon the subject that results are not likely to be prompt.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment by way of a substitute for the pending bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment in the nature of a substitute will be reported.

The reading clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and substitute therefor the following:

"That section 22 of the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting '(1)' after the section number at the beginning of such section and by adding to the section two new paragraphs, as follows, to wit:

"'(2) The commission is empowered to require, after notice and hearing, each carrier by rail, subject to this act, to issue at such offices as may be prescribed by the commission joint interchangeable mileage tickets at a just and reasonable rate per mile, good for interstate passenger carriage upon the passenger trains of any and all other carriers by rail subject to this act. Such tickets may be required to be issued for any distance not exceeding 5,000 miles nor less than 1,000 miles. Before making any order requiring the issuance of any such tickets the commission shall make and publish such reasonable rules and regulations for their issuance and use as in its judgment the public interest demands; and especially it shall prescribe whether such tickets are transferable or nontransferable, and if the latter, what identification may be required; and especially, also, to what baggage privileges the lawful holders of such tickets are entitled.

"'(3) Any carrier which through the act of any agent or employee willfully refuses to issue or accept any such ticket demanded or presented under the lawful requirements of this act, or willfully refuses to conform to the rules and regulations lawfully made and published by the commission hereunder, or any person who shall willfully offer for carriage any such ticket contrary to the said rules and regulations shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction shall be fined not to exceed $1,000.'"

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Arkansas before he proceeds with his remarks?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the Senator from Arkansas why the size of the mileage book was fixed at 5,000 miles rather than 1,000, 2,000, or 3,000?

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that ought to be reduced, as I said during the course of my remarks, probably to 2,000 miles.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, I desire to say it was stated that if the railroads were compelled to issue mileage books for 1,000 miles, a very great number of people might buy a 1,000-mile ticket who could not buy a 5,000-mile ticket and thereby greatly reduce the revenue of the railroads from passenger traffic. As the Senator well knows, the pending measure is very largely sponsored by the commercial travelers and other allied associations. Their theory has been that if the books were fixed at 5,000 miles the commercial travelers would very largely purchase them, but that the general traveling public would not purchase them; that the commercial travelers would thereby enjoy the book thus issued, and that the revenue to the railroads would not be so greatly reduced as by a thousand-mile ticket which the general public would buy. That was partially the theory.

Mr. ROBINSON. The bill is based upon the principle of wholesaling transportation.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is the point I was going to make.

Mr. ROBINSON. And it was thought probable by the framers of the bill that a 5,000-mile book would more clearly recognize that principle than would a 1,000-mile book.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is what I was about to say.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have said and I repeat that I think the limitation as to 5,000 miles ought to be reduced to 2,000 miles, and, so far as I am concerned, I would not oppose an amendment to that end, although I am not offering such an amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If this measure shall pass, I am very seriously in favor of a 5,000-mile book. I take it that all of the organizations referred to stand for the 5,000-mile book, and that so far as they are concerned they desire the measure passed in that form.

Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Senate. After having spoken, with interruptions, for over an hour, he said: I will yield the floor now, knowing that there is some business to be done that should be done before the Senate adjourns, with the hope that when the consideration of the bill is resumed to-morrow I may be permitted to conclude what I have to say about it.

DUTIES OF FEDERAL JUDGES.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, if I am in order, I desire to move that Senate bill 384, to require judges appointed under authority of the United States to devote their entire time to the duties of a judge, be made the unfinished business.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I hope——

Mr. ROBINSON. I make the point of order that such a motion is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, January 19, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, January 18, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, while the days of our pilgrimage are hurrying by we are so thankful that Thy mercy is attending us. The prints of Thy fingers are upon us, and our souls are the crowning gifts of Thy handiwork. O assure us of Thy presence, Lord, and make our errors the beginnings of wisdom. More and more establish us in love and in obedience, and lift us above the corroding influences of weakness and fear. Give us hearts that lovingly accept Thy providences and find peace and rest even in their mysteries. Always enable us to bear the yoke of service without complaint and to do our duty in the spirit of a high privilege; and when we falter or fail hold us with Thy gentle hand. Through Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. To-day is Calendar Wednesday.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate as between the gentleman from Minnesota and the gentleman from Texas stands as follows: The gentleman from Minnesota has 153 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Texas 117 minutes remaining.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to myself. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, in what I have to say I shall not dwell on the evil sought to be remedied by the pending bill. It is an evil recognized and deplored by all law-abiding citizens. When the colored people were emancipated from slavery and their freedom had been assured by the adoption of the thirteenth amendment to our Constitution, it became evident that unless certain States were restrained from unfairly discriminating against or otherwise oppressing them the liberty which the thirteenth amendment sought to confer might be illusory, if not a positive injury. To guard against that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution was proposed and adopted. This amendment made all the citizens of a State citizens of the United States as well, and forbade the State making or enforcing any law which should abridge the privileges or immunities of the citizens of the United States, and further directed that no State should deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. We seek to rest this legislation upon that amendment. That a person who is lynched by a mob has been deprived of life without due process of law, and that he has been denied the equal protection of the laws needs no argument.

We are confronted with a situation that must bring a blush of shame to every law-abiding citizen. The record shows that since this amendment was adopted thousands of persons have been put to death by mob violence. Almost every week one or more persons suffer death in that way, many in a manner that would disgrace a savage and uncivilized country. One of the saddest comments upon these outrages is that a very large proportion of the victims are innocent of the crime for which they are put to death. Instead of these outrages lessening in number, they appear rather to be on the increase and to have become a recognized mode of dealing with certain classes of persons or crimes. It is practiced with utter disregard of law and without the slightest danger of punishment in many sections of this country. In view of this situation it is asked, and earnestly asked, is there not some power in the Federal Government to correct this evil?

From the history of the times and the legislation that Congress sought to enact immediately after the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, I believe it is clear that it was understood and intended to confer on Congress such power. The Supreme Court has repeatedly and uniformly held that Congress has power to enforce this amendment by legislation. The fifth section of the amendment provides in so many words that Congress may enforce it. In view of that fact, the constitutional question involved in the pending bill is whether it provides appropriate legislation. All the vehement appeals that have been made against it as an attempt to violate the Constitution are nothing but mere rhetoric. If this legislation is without constitutional warrant, the Supreme Court will promptly set it aside. But if we believe it to be valid, its enactment is in line with the duty we owe as Members of the House.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; I can not yield.

In considering the constitutionality of this bill I desire that you bear in mind that the measure as reported by the committee involves only three substantive propositions. Two of these, sections 5 and 6 and the first paragraph of section 3, are, as I view it, clearly within the logic and language of an unbroken line of Supreme Court decisions. The feature of the bill that is drawn in question, especially by the early decisions of that court, arise upon section 4 and the last paragraph of section 3, in that they seek to punish individuals that are not officers of a State. It is contended that Congress has no such power. Even if section 4 and the last paragraph of section 3 should be held void, that part of the bill still remaining would go a long way toward compelling the States to protect their citizens. We do not desire to take from the States any power that they possess so long as that power is exercised in obedience to the Constitution of the United States.

Only a few words will be devoted to the question of whether sections 5 and 6 and the first paragraph of section 3 are constitutional. The first part of the latter section makes it a crime for an officer of a State who is charged with the duty, or who has the power or authority to protect the life of any person, or who has any person in his charge as a prisoner, that fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to protect such person from being put to death. The Supreme Court in Ex parte Virginia, found in One hundredth United States, 339, in dealing with a case in which a State judge was prosecuted under an act passed for the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment, held that in selecting a jury this judge by excluding and failing to select upon the panel colored jurors made himself liable to indictment and punishment for a crime. In speaking of the power of Congress under this amendment the court, on page 346, said:

> Nor does it make any difference that such legislation is restrictive of what the State might have done before the constitutional amendment was adopted. The prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment are directed to the States, and they are to a degree restrictions of State power. It is these which Congress is empowered to enforce, and to enforce against State action, however put forth, whether that action be executive, legislative, or judicial. Such enforcement is no invasion of State sovereignty.

> But the constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons, and to insure to all persons the enjoyment of such rights, power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a State, but upon the persons who are the agents of the State in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured.

The case of United States v. Reese (92 U. S., 215) is also in point, because it was there held that a State officer who deprived a citizen of a right to vote because of his color might be punished for violating the fifteenth amendment, which, in form, is directed to the State the same as the fourteenth amendment. It would not seem necessary to cite any further cases on this point, as the doctrine announced in these cases is in line with the general theory upon which the court has proceeded ever since the amendment was adopted.

Sections 5 and 6 impose a penalty upon a county where a person is killed by a mob. This is a remedy that is in force in a number of States. It is borrowed from England and is so ancient that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary. Such laws have been uniformly held to be constitutional. It would seem quite clear that this is an appropriate method of enforcing this amendment. The county is a political subdivision of a State created for the purpose and charged with the duty of enforcing law in its locality. It is that part of the State that is guilty of failing to enforce this amendment when a person is killed by a mob. Such a punishment appears to be fully warranted from the doctrine that under this amendment Congress does not proceed against the State itself, but against the instrumentalities of the State that violate its provisions. The Supreme Court in Chicago v. Sturges (222 U. S., 323), in affirming a judgment against that city for a like penalty, used this language:

> The policy of imposing liability upon a civil subdivision of government exercising delegated police power is familiar to every student of the common law. We find it recognized in the beginning of the police system of Anglo-Saxon people. Thus, "The hundred," a very early form of civil subdivision, was held answerable for robberies committed within the division. By a series of statutes, beginning possibly in 1285, in the statutes of Winchester (13 Edw. I, ch. 1), coming on down to the 27 Elizabeth, chapter 13, the riot act of George I (1 Geo. I, Stat. 2) and act of 8 George II, chapter 16, we may find a continuous recognition of the principle that a civil subdivision intrusted with the duty of protecting property in its midst and with police power to discharge the function may be made answerable not only for negligence affirmatively shown but absolutely as not having afforded a protection adequate to the obligation. Statutes of a similar character have been enacted by several of the States and held valid exertions of the police power. (Darlington v. Mayor, etc., of New York, 31 N. Y., 164; Fauvia v. New Orleans, 20 La. Ann., 410; County of Allegheny v. Gibson, etc., 90 Pa. St., 397.) The imposition of absolute liability upon the community when property is destroyed through the violence of a mob is not, therefore, an unusual police regulation, neither is it arbitrary as not resting upon reasonable grounds of policy. Such a regulation has a tendency to deter the lawless, since the sufferer must be compensated by a tax burden which will fall upon all property, including that of the evildoers as members of the community. It is likewise calculated to stimulate the exertions of the indifferent and the law-abiding to avoid the falling of a burden which they must share with the lawless. In that it directly operates on and affects public opinion; it tends strongly to the upholding of the empire of the law.

The suggestion that the imposition of a fine or forfeiture for a failure to perform a duty is the imposition of a tax is novel. This is not a tax any more than the imposition of a fine upon an individual is a tax. The claim that this punishment could be made so large as to destroy the counties is met by the seventh amendment to the Constitution which prevents excessive fines. Nor is there any merit in the contention that the Federal Government has no police power. That it has such power in carrying out its expressed power—and this is an expressed power—no one questions at this late date. The following are some of the recent cases on the subject: Hoke v. United States (227 U. S., 308), Buchanan v. Warey (245 U. S., 60), Hamilton v. Kentucky Distillery Co. (251 U. S., 146).

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not have the time.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will yield to the gentleman an additional minute if he will yield.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. What is it?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. In the distillery case, did not the judge hold that the Federal Government had no police power?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The judge repeated the old formula that the Federal Government has no police power, but said that the Federal Government had a power the same as a police power. In some cases the court has said that the Federal Government has a police power but in the early days the court started out with the statement that the Government had no police power, but all through our history it has exercised such power, and it is about time that fiction disappeared. The Federal Government has no general police powers but it exercises all sorts of police powers under its express powers.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understood the gentleman to say that in the distillery case it was decided that they had police power.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. They held that the Federal Government had the power but did not call it police power.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman if Judge Brandeis did not hold that the Federal Government has no police power?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In about three lines. But it is all nonsense to talk about the Federal Government not having police power because anybody who has read any law at all knows that the Government exercises a power the same as the police power and which in fact is a police power.

In considering the constitutional question involved in section 4 and the second paragraph of section 3 I believe it can be said that the precise point that will be raised by this legislation as I expect to have it amended has never before been presented to the Supreme Court. A number of statutes were passed shortly after the adoption of the fourteenth amendment and held void, but the operation of those statutes did not depend upon any failure of the State to protect the individual. In setting aside those statutes the court repeatedly called attention to that fact. I shall not attempt to analyze the numerous cases in which this amendment has been discussed. There are hundreds of them. Many of the criminal cases depend upon the particular language of the statute under which the charge was made or the form of the indictment drawn to meet the particular facts of the case. But they all proceeded on the theory that Congress had power to act whether the State was in default or not.

To avoid the construction that this is direct instead of corrective legislation it is my intention to offer an amendment to the bill so as to make the provisions of sections 3 and 4 inapplicable to any private person until the State has had a reasonable opportunity to perform its duty. My view is that when the State fails to punish it denies the protection guaranteed by the amendment, acquiesces in the action of the mob, and consents to a continuance of that mode of punishing offenses.

In construing this amendment it is well to bear in mind what was said in regard to it in Guthrie's Fourteenth Amendment. I read from page 33:

> The construction or interpretation of a constitution is not governed by the rules that apply to ordinary statutes or private writings. A constitution is designed to be a frame or organic law of government and to settle and determine the fundamental rights of the individual. A national constitution is intended to endure for all time. Its provisions should not in any sense be limited to the conditions happening to exist when it is adopted, although those conditions and the history of the times may well throw light upon the provisions and reveal their true scope. Such a constitution is an enumeration of general principles and powers or of limitations upon the exercise of governmental functions, and it is not a mere code of rules to regulate particular cases. All progress and improvement would be barred and a constitution would soon become useless if it were not construed as a declaration of general principles to be applied and adapted as new conditions presented themselves.

The first section of the fourteenth amendment was at first construed very narrowly. It was thought by the Supreme Court at one time that its provisions were only applicable to the Negroes, but that view soon disappeared; it was contended that it gave no rights to one person as against another, and still case after case can be cited in which such rights have been asserted and secured. Due process of law at first meant very little, but it has been gradually developed and expanded way beyond what anyone imagined it would mean when it was first written. This narrow construction of this amendment is contrary to the practice that has prevailed in construing the Constitution, but this gradual evolution is in line with that practice. It is evident that the committee that drew and the Congress which proposed this amendment gave to it a construction that would afford ample protection to life as well as liberty and property. I read from the same authority, pages 59 to 61:

> There can be no reasonable doubt that the reconstruction committee understood and contemplated that among the privileges and immunities they were seeking to protect against invasion or abridgment by the States were included those set forth in the first eight amendments. The committee's report declared that it was necessary to have such "changes of the organic law as shall determine the civil rights and privileges of all citizens in all parts of the Republic." In submitting the amendment to the Senate on behalf of the committee, Senator Howard presented what he said were "the views and the motives which influenced that committee * * * and the ends it aims to accomplish." Speaking of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, he said, "We may gather some intimation of what probably will be the opinion of the judiciary by referring to a case adjudged many years ago." He then quoted at length from Corfield v. Coryell, 4 Wash. C. C. Rep. 371, 380, and proceeded to say: "Such is the character of the privileges and immunities spoken of in the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution. To these privileges and immunities, whatever they may be—for they are not and can not be fully defined in their entire extent and precise nature—to these should be added the personal rights guaranteed and secured by the first eight amendments of the Constitution, such as the freedom of speech and the press; the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances, a right appertaining to each and all the people; the right to keep and bear arms; the right to be exempted from the quartering of soldiers in a house without the consent of the owner; the right to be exempt from unreasonable searches and seizures, and from any search or seizure except by virtue of a warrant issued upon a formal oath or affidavit; the right of an accused person to be informed of the nature of the accusation against him, and his right to be tried by an impartial jury of the vicinage; and also the right to be secure against excessive bail and against cruel and unusual punishments." After further discussion, Senator Howard continued: "The great object of the first section of this amendment is therefore to restrain the power of the States and compel them at all times to respect these great fundamental guaranties."
> From these statements as to the declared purpose of the framers, officially and authoritatively made to the Senate on behalf of the reconstruction committee, it would seem to be entirely clear that the intention was that the essential rights of life, liberty, and property, distinctly recognized in the Constitution and in the first eight amendments, should, by the fourteenth amendment, be made the indisputable and secure possession of every citizen of the United States beyond the power of any State to abridge. * * *

If the contention of those who insist that Congress has no power to deal with the individual is correct, the main purpose of this amendment has, as I view it, been defeated. It is true that under that construction property may under certain circumstances be fairly well protected, and so may a person's liberty; but the protection of life, which was no doubt one of the main considerations for its adoption, is left to the mercy of a mob. Instead of this amendment being a shield over the poor man's hut, it becomes by this construction a protection to wealth and a bulwark for what the socialists delight to call privilege. The Supreme Court may give protection under existing laws against any affirmative action of a State when a person can be made a party to an action. Its writs or judgments can then be directed against the State courts or officers engaged in violating the amendment. But the person whose life has been taken by a mob can not become a party to an action and is beyond the reach of the court. His dependents weep in vain, while thousands of others threatened with a like fate tremble with fear lest they be the next victims. I do not believe that Congress is without power. I can not persuade myself that the Supreme Court will so hold. When Congress was given power to enforce the amendment it would seem that any fair construction would authorize it to see that the purpose of the amendment was fulfilled. The real question is, Can Congress act when the State fails to act and fails to protect? The Supreme Court has repeatedly said that the Federal Government occupies toward the State the position of a guarantor. The duty of a guarantor is not to compel his principal to pay, but to pay when his principal makes default.

That a State may deny due process or protection of law by inaction as well as by action would seem to be clear. In the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 23) the court, in enumerating wrongs obnoxious to the amendment, said "that allowing persons who have committed certain crimes—horse stealing, for example—to be seized and hung by the posse comitatus without regular trial" would be one such wrong. In Strauder v. West Virginia (100 U. S., 306) the court said Congress had power to enforce this amendment in case a State withholds from a person equal protection of the law; and in that same case (p. 307) it is said that "the words of the amendment, it is true, are prohibitory, but they contain a necessary implication of a positive immunity or right most valuable to the colored race." The colored race is not given any greater right or immunity under this amendment than other races or persons.

In United States v. Hall (26 Fed. Cases, p. 81), Circuit Judge Wood, sitting with Busteed, district judge, in speaking for the court in explaining the power of Congress under the provision of this amendment prohibiting a State from denying to any person under its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law, said:

"Congress may enforce this provision by appropriate legislation." From these provisions it follows clearly, as it seems to us, that Congress has the power by appropriate legislation to protect the fundamental rights of citizens of the United States against unfriendly or insufficient State legislation, for the fourteenth amendment not only prohibits the making or enforcing of laws which shall abridge the privileges of the citizen, but prohibits the States from denying to all persons within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Denying includes inaction as well as action, and denying the equal protection of the law includes the omission to protect as well as the omission to pass laws for protection. The citizen of the United States is entitled to the enforcement of the laws for the protection of his fundamental rights as well as the enactment of such laws. Therefore, to guard against the invasion of the citizen's fundamental rights and to insure their adequate protection, as well against State legislation as State inaction or incompetency, the amendment gives Congress the power to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation.

In United States v. Blackburn (24 Fed. Cases, p. 1158) Judge Krekel expressed this view:

Hence if the outrages and crimes shown to have been committed in the case before you were well known to the community at large, and that community and the officers of the law willfully failed to employ the means provided by law to ferret out and bring to trial the offenders because of the victims being colored, it is depriving them of the equal protection of the law.

In Louisiana & Northwest Railroad Co. v. Bosworth (233 Fed., 191) the court said:

And what is it to deny equal protection? It is to refuse to grant or to withhold equal treatment.

In Truax against Corrigan, decided last December, the Supreme Court held that because the State of Arizona by a statute sought to withhold protection from a certain class of persons it therefore denied due process and equal protection.

I am not aware of any case in which the Supreme Court has held that an omission or failure to afford protection is not within the prohibition of this amendment. I do not believe that the Supreme Court will ever hold that Congress does not have all the power that is necessary to fully enforce it. It is a rule of universal application that every statute must be construed so as to carry out the object intended to be accomplished by it.

Cyclopedia of Law and Procedure, volume 36, page 1110, cites a vast number of cases in support of that doctrine.

In Ex parte Virginia, Mr. Justice Strong stated the rule to be:

Congress is authorized to enforce the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the amendments fully effective. Whatever legislation is appropriate—that is, adapted to carry out the objects the amendments have in view—whatever tends to enforce submission to the prohibitions they contain, and to secure to all persons the enjoyment of perfect equality of civil rights and equal protection of the laws against State denial or invasion, if not prohibited, is brought within the domain of congressional power.

I do not believe anyone has any doubt as to the purpose sought to be accomplished by this amendment. It must have been the power to carry out that purpose which was to protect life, liberty, and property under just laws that was conferred on Congress. And that is, in effect, what the Supreme Court said in this case. There is in the language of the amendment no limit upon the means that Congress may employ for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I can not yield. If I yield to every one who wants to ask me a question, I would never get through.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is not debating; that is shooting in the back.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You realize that one could break up the whole discussion very readily by asking questions every minute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the gentleman occupies a peculiar position. He is the chairman of this great committee and as such——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, I occupy the same position as every one else does in a discussion such as this.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But the gentleman is the chairman of this committee.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is impossible to discuss a constitutional question with continual interruptions; there is no reason why I should not be treated as others on this floor. If the purpose of the amendment is not to be considered, but a literal construction given to it, the first section of the amendment would practically be waste paper, for then the Federal Government could only proceed against the State itself and could not reach its courts and officers. No such impractical construction has been placed upon it. Not only do the courts issue their writs and direct their judgments and decrees against courts and officers acting in obedience to State authority but they proceed against any State officer, though he acts in violation of his duty and entirely without authority from the State. This doctrine is firmly established.

The late case of Home Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. City of Los Angeles (227 U. S., 278) reviews the cases on this subject and reaffirms the rule. In this case Barney v. New York (193 U. S., 430) was overruled in so far as that case held that an officer acting without authority from the State could not be proceeded against. If it can be held that a person who has no authority from a State to do the act that is prohibited by this amendment can be punished for that very act on the theory that such act is still that of the State, it would seem fully as consistent with the letter and spirit of the amendment to punish those who usurp and assume the function of the State and thus prevent a State from doing its duty. The doing of that would simply be to aid the State in the performance of its duty, which evidently was one of the purposes for which Congress was given power to enforce. It is clear that if a State should so amend its laws that life, liberty, or property could not be protected within its borders Congress could not force the State to enact the necessary laws; and if a State failed to provide the necessary courts or officers to secure such protection the Federal Government could not compel the State to provide such courts and officers. No one, I venture to say, would propose a penalty against a member of a State legislature for failure to provide necessary laws, and no court could by any writ known to the law compel a legislature to act, nor could the courts or officers of a State be punished for failure to protect a person that the State did not authorize them to protect. Under such circumstances citizens of the United States could secure no protection under this amendment unless Congress could act. It is not an impossible or even improbable thing that I am suggesting. Only a few days ago the Supreme Court held void a statute of the State of Arizona by which it was attempted to deprive certain classes of persons of due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. In that case it was found possible to grant relief, but a statute could easily have been so framed that the Supreme Court could not have afforded such protection. If Congress is to be permitted to enforce the protection to citizens, it must have power to protect the individual not only against the action but also against the inaction of the State. It can not protect against inaction unless it can reach and punish the individual when the State fails to do so.

The Supreme Court does not, as I view it, follow the rule that is contended for by the opponents of this bill. In Simon v. Southern Railway Co. (236 U. S., 115) an action brought in the Federal court was sustained enjoining the plaintiff in an action in which a judgment had been obtained without due process of law from collecting that judgment. In that action no State court or State officer was involved. The action proceeded directly against a private person who was plaintiff in a judgment obtained in accordance with the State law, but which was held void because in violation of this amendment. A curious situation has arisen in a number of cases. The case of Ex parte Young (209 U. S., 123) is a leading case. There an action was brought in a Federal court for an injunction against the attorney general of the State charging that as such attorney general he was about to enforce a State statute alleged to be void because in contravention of this amendment. It was contended that this action could not be maintained because the eleventh amendment to the Constitution prohibits action against the State. The court held that it was not an action against the State, but against Mr. Young as a private individual, and still retained jurisdiction of the suit for the purpose of enforcing this amendment. It is a good deal of a fiction to contend that a court is enforcing this amendment against a State where two individuals are litigating over the unauthorized act of a State officer, and neither the officer nor the State is a party or interested in the slightest degree in the result of the action. The Supreme Court directs its writs, judgments, or decrees in ordinary actions against the persons in the action. It does not limit its action to prohibition against the State or State action as such, but determines the merits of the controversy in a suit and directs the form of judgment to be entered against the persons to the suit.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and three Members present, a quorum.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No. I have already stated that I can not yield.

When a State fails to punish those who commit mob murder it fails to afford due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. Aside from immediate police protection, which in most instances can not be given, the one method recognized and relied on by every government as the appropriate, the necessary, and effective means for protecting persons against lawlessness is the punishment of those who violate law. In that connection let me again call your attention to the case of United States v. Blackburn. The court there expressly held that a failure to arrest and punish persons known to the officers as guilty of a murder was a failure to afford due process of law and the equal protection of the laws. The punishment of crime is not so much for the correction of the guilty person as for the purpose of deterring others from committing like offenses. When a mob murder occurs and the perpetrators go unpunished it makes certain that others will become victims of like outrages. If the perpetrators of such murders were promptly and adequately punished, there would be no mob law in this country any more than there is in other civilized countries. To insist that the Federal Government has no other remedy than to punish the officers who fail to perform their duty, instead of punishing members of the mob who are the real offenders, is to insist that the Government shall perform its duty by doing an impractical and impossible thing. But aside from that the officers, unless they participate in the murder, can not be punished for the murder. They could in most instances only be punished for negligence, and in the vast majority of cases could not be penalized at all.

There is nothing in the language of the fourteenth amendment that prohibits action against individuals when the State makes default; that is, if Congress has power to enforce its plain purpose, and I can see no sense in refusing to apply to this amendment the familiar rule that it must be construed so as to carry out its purpose. The contention that such a construction is inadmissible because it would give the Federal courts jurisdiction of every criminal offense is an argument against a policy and not against the power of Congress. It is the function of Congress and not the courts to determine policies.

The argument is, however, fallacious on another ground. From a practical standpoint it would add but very little to the reach of this amendment as it is now being enforced. Under the present law a person charged with any crime can have the protection of this amendment by appealing from the highest court of the State to the Supreme Court of the United States. If, as I suggest, no action could be had under Federal law unless a State failed to punish, the law could only operate where public sentiment was such that due process and protection of law could not be secured. In the ordinary case the Federal Government would have no chance to act because the State would perform its duty. When, however, a community makes it impossible for its courts and officers to enforce law the protection that the National Government has guaranteed ought to be given, and I have no patience with the doctrine that justifies repudiation of our obligations upon a mere technicality.

There is no merit in blinking the fact that we are face to face with the situation that lynch law is the only law that functions under certain circumstances. The mob is the judge, the jury, and the executioner. Its acts are sanctioned by the weakness or supineness of the State. The fact that the mob does not consult statutes or measure the punishment it inflicts with the nicety of the ordinary court does not make it any the less a tribunal for the punishment of crime. The lawlessness of the punishment it inflicts should not be made a shield against prosecution. It can not be material that the mob does not claim to represent the State or that it has no authority from the State when it usurps and performs the functions that no one but the State can lawfully perform. The enforcement of the lynch law is not revolution against the State; but is, as the phrase goes, the act of the public taking the law into their own hands. While I do not believe that it makes any difference whether the mob has any authority from the State or not, I confess I can see no good reason why the mob should not be held to represent the State when it assumes to function for the State. Its action is the only administration of law when it puts a person to death as a punishment for a crime. It seems to me there is as much reason for holding its act to be the act of the State as there is for holding that an unauthorized act of a State officer is the act of a State. We punish such an officer upon the theory that he acts for the State; why not make the members of the mob subject to like punishment? The officer has no more warrant from the State for his action than has the mob.

The question of whether Congress can punish those who interfere with an officer of a State was carefully considered by the circuit court in United States v. Powell (151 Fed., 658). This case was affirmed by the Supreme Court because, as I construe the decision, it rests on statutes that are direct instead of corrective. Statutes that only protect against the invasion of the rights and privileges secured to citizens by the Constitution of the United States and not rights and privileges pertaining to citizens of a State that are only guaranteed to such citizens by the fourteenth amendment. In my view of the law the Supreme Court was right in affirming this case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, there are but 50 people present in the Chamber, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members present, a quorum.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In conclusion, let me again call attention to the fact that all prior legislation under this amendment that has been held void was not in any way made to depend on any failure on the part of a State, but was direct and not corrective, and that whatever was said in those cases must be construed with reference to such statutes. It would seem that if Congress has power to carry out the purpose of this amendment it has and must have power to punish not only the officers of the State but also persons who prevent a State from performing its duty. It is too plain to require argument that such purpose can not be carried out in any other way. I confidently believe that the Supreme Court will eventually hold that Congress has such power and that we are justified in submitting the question to that court for its decision upon that point.

This amendment made every person born in the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States and of the State of his residence. This was done to confer upon him rights and privileges denied to him in the famous Dred Scott decision. It was adopted to place him under the protection of the National Government and to impose upon that Government the duty to see that he was not deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or denied the equal protection of the laws. The Government asserts the right to command not only the services but the lives of its citizens in case of war. Hundreds of thousands—yes, millions—of men were drafted in the late war. When these men returned to their homes they and those they hold dear were in many instances threatened with the fury and cruelty of lawless mobs. The Government that will not defend its defenders, that will not protect those whom it compels to face shot and shell to protect its interest, is a disgrace to the family of nations, and I hope that this Congress will help to wipe such a stain from our flag and carry out the purpose of those who drew and those who proposed this amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say, in effect, that so far as the constitutional power of Congress is concerned we have the power to pass a law to punish any crime.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Provided you make it dependent upon whether the State fails to perform its duty or not.

Mr. MANN. I do not know how I am going to vote upon this bill, and I want to get some information. Do I understand it is contended by the gentleman that if some man commits murder down here and is not apprehended we have the power to pass a law to have the Government of the United States apprehend him?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You would have to have Congress or a court first determine whether the State is refusing or is too weak or inefficient to have the man punished.

Mr. MANN. But I have stated the fact that he is not apprehended by the local authorities or by the State.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. In the case of lynching everybody in the community knows what has happened. As a rule the people remain there and there is no difficulty if you want to arrest anyone to have that done. In the case of murder, in a great many instances the murderer skips out, so you can not arrest him. It might be proper, in drafting an amendment of the kind I suggest to provide that a court should determine whether the State had failed to do its duty. But I believe if the State fails to do its duty we have the power to impose penalties.

Mr. MANN. Of course, constitutional power is the same, regardless of what the amendment is.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; but we must take into consideration what the circumstances are.

Mr. MANN. The Supreme Court must take into consideration the power of Congress to enact legislation.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The manner of using the power depends upon the circumstances under which we exercise it.

Mr. MANN. The power of Congress does not depend upon circumstances.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The right to exercise it depends upon the circumstances.

Mr. MANN. The power of Congress was fixed when the constitutional amendment became a part of the Constitution.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is true.

Mr. MANN. You have not changed the circumstances.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You can not pass the same kind of a law and make it fit every case. You must adapt the law to the circumstances, so you do not exceed the power that is granted.

Mr. MANN. You could pass it if there had never been a lynching. There is no magic in the word "mob." I understand the gentleman rests his contention on the power to punish individuals; that the mob is a court acting for the State, and the State is responsible for them.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is one among other suggestions, but what I believe is this, that when the State fails to perform its functions the guaranty of the United States applies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has plenty of time. I would like to ask this question: If we define the mob as five, of course we could define it as three; we could define it as one, could we not?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Because it would not be a mob.

Mr. MANN. We define the word "mob," and we could make it any number we please.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The old common-law definition of a mob required at least three persons.

Mr. MANN. Suppose this case: It is very common practice now, I regret to say, in cities and countries alike, that four or five or six gentlemen—I use the term—drive up in front of a bank or a store, or maybe stop at the side of a street, and pull a revolver on somebody and ask him to "put up." Suppose there were five of them? Have we the power on the part of the General Government to go and punish, or to seek out, or indict those men?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. When the State fails, but we have got to make some showing that the State is in default.

Mr. MANN. In most cases the State fails and the men go off and we do not get them. Have we the power to do it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. My opinion is that under the fourteenth amendment we have the power whenever the State fails to perform its duty.

Mr. MANN. I understand, then, that the passage of this bill is a declaration that Congress has the power to provide for seizure and punishment of any individual who commits any crime in any State at any time hereafter?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Provided the State acquiesces or practically consents by its inaction, because then it endangers everyone in that community, because the effect is to deny protection of the laws.

Mr. MANN. I simply add to the proposition, provided the State does not convict him?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. You think we have the power if the State does not convict him?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think that the question of conviction can be considered. Take, in the Frank case, while the mob was threatening the court and threatening to take that man out of the State court and lynch him, if the Federal court could have protected him by giving him a fair trial I think there is a clear intimation on the part of the Supreme Court that it would have held that it might do so if we had had a suitable statute, but there was no such statute.

Mr. MANN. As I get the gentleman now, his position is that if the State does not punish a man for committing a crime, wherever it is or whatever it is, we have the power to do it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. You have my view of it, I believe; though your question would hardly indicate that you have.

Mr. MANN. That is what I think.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield, the section which deals with the imposition of fine upon the county and authorizes the Federal judge to levy the tax, I understood the gentleman to express the opinion was a constitutional proposition?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I did. It is not a tax. The method of collecting it is the method of collecting a judgment now under the Federal law. You can get a mandamus to compel a judgment to be placed on the tax records to-day. That is simply a copy of existing statute.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That is, in a civil case?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is immaterial whether it is in a civil or a criminal case.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Where the judgment runs against the county. This is an assessment of a fine.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, there are powers in the State which have been exercised and regulate the matter of assessment of taxes by a county, and the gentleman quoted the South Carolina statute, which imposes a fine upon the county authorizes the fixing of them. Does the gentleman see any distinction between the power of the State in that regard and the power of a Federal judge in that regard?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. When that judgment is entered it is in a civil action brought for the collection of that fine. The judgment is like any other judgment, and can be enforced even if we do not put that provision in this law for its collection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the gentleman's bill goes further.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give himself another minute? I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. One minute probably will not be enough, but I yield myself a minute.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Does the gentleman base the power of Congress upon the proposition that the Federal Government has jurisdiction whenever a State fails to prevent crime?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Whenever a State practically acquiesces in the lawlessness.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. I say whenever a State fails to prevent crime.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think whenever a State fails to protect life, liberty, or property it is the duty of the Federal Government to see that it is done, and if it can not be done in any other way it may be done by punishing the individual at fault.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Then your contention is practically that the Federal Government has jurisdiction over all crimes?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Whenever there is a failure by the State to obey the fourteenth amendment it is made the duty of Congress to enforce it.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. And the county can not be fined unless the State fails?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, if there were any argument needed against the constitutionality of this bill and any argument that is sufficient to show its utter unconstitutionality, that was brought out just a few moments ago by the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. That same question was asked before the Committee on the Judiciary, and it received a reply that I think will find lodgment in the minds of all fair-thinking lawyers.

Many cases have been cited here on the floor on both sides, but I am satisfied that if those who have made these arguments and cited these authorities were on the bench and the question of the constitutionality of this act came before them they would not decide in favor of its constitutionality upon the arguments and authorities which they themselves have submitted in this debate. I do not propose during the brief time that has been allotted to me to review those cases or to cite them. They have been cited time upon top of time here, and you are all familiar with them and with the principles they set out. Those same cases were cited before the Committee on the Judiciary by Col. Goff, the assistant to the Attorney General, who is, I understand, one of the ablest lawyers of the country and a man whose opinions are entitled to the highest respect. In the hearings before the committee, after many citations of authorities by Col. Goff, which he applied to his argument, Mr. REAVIS, the gentleman from Nebraska, asked Col. Goff what conclusion his arguments would lead to, and Col. Goff said:

It is a legislative fact, and I say that when the legislative department of our Government has determined the fact, the courts uniformly decline to go into the justification of the legislative motive, unless it is so very absurd that upon its face it would be in excess of authority. If the Congress of the United States, in view of the fact that a State has a law punishing murder, says there should be a Federal law punishing murder in order that there may be conceded to the people of that State an equal, vigorous, and speedy enforcement of the law and the protection of their lives and their property, then Congress would have the right, in the exercise of the correlative duty of protection, to do so. If the State is helpless for any reason to secure these rights—and the people are deprived of their enjoyment—is Congress justified in condoning the deprivation merely because of the absence of some formal action by the State?

Mr. REAVIS. Would you carry that further, to burglary, larceny, and assault and battery?

Mr. GOFF. Of course, the principle would carry us there. It would carry us there, not only under the broad, general terms of the Federal police power, but it would carry us there under the general power to maintain peace and to insure that peace which is known as the peace of the United States. If a State declined to maintain order under the law, could Congress justify a refusal to protect and enforce such rights as were violated if these rights were dependent on the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. REAVIS. Then, I gather from what you say, and I want to understand you, that under the fourteenth amendment Congress would have the right to enact legislation under the police power covering the crimes of the homicide, larceny, burglary, and embezzlement, which are purely State offenses?

To that question Col. Goff replies in the affirmative and answers yes. Later on in these hearings, discussing other features of the bill, Col. Goff made a statement, as follows:

I have not discussed that view of the bill, but have addressed my remarks rather to the other question, whether a Federal law creating the crime of murder could be passed under the fourteenth amendment.

Col. Goff used the same line of authorities that has been used here on the floor by the proponents of this bill, and yet under that line of authorities he was forced to admit, able lawyer that he is, that if you would follow his line of reasoning to the ultimate conclusion it would wipe out absolutely the State lines, and that the Federal Congress would have the power to class every crime on the calendar a Federal offense and place it under the jurisdiction of the Federal courts. Will anyone seriously contend that under the fourteenth amendment the Congress of the United States has the right to punish larceny and burglary and other such minor offenses, which have not been committed against the peace and dignity of the United States, but against the peace and dignity of the respective States? Their argument and reasoning lead them to this conclusion.

Oh, but they say, "We must give them equal protection, and the deprivation is a denial, and consequently we have the right to legislate." They even go so far, Mr. Chairman, in their arguments and in their reasoning as to set down as a fact that Congress by a mere legislative fiat can override the plain terms of the Constitution as laid down in the fourteenth amendment.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], who has just concluded his remarks, refers to a long line of authorities which he says were under the fourteenth amendment, and he says that the books are full of thousands of such cases, defining what is meant by due process of law and the equal-protection clause of the fourteenth amendment.

Yes, Mr. Chairman; the books are full of those decisions, but running all through that long line of decisions and permeating every single one of them you will find the old case of Barbour against Connolly, in One hundred and thirteenth United States, which has been affirmed and reaffirmed time after time. That case says, referring to the fourteenth amendment:

Neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the powers of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people.

That case lays down the principles governing the police power of the States under that amendment. It was the law when it was enunciated at that time and it is the law to-day; and a mere legislative declaration, writing into this act the statement that we claim it to be under the fourteenth amendment does not put it within that amendment or upon constitutional grounds. If we can do that in this act, if by legislative fiat we can make an act constitutional when it is in plain violation of the terms of the Constitution, we can do it in every case and as to every act that we pass.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard these arguments. I have read them and studied them, and while many of them cite authorities, yet I have noticed that in most instances the authorities are cited almost apologetically, and practically all of them admit that, at the most, the question is doubtful; but they say or infer that on the ground of expediency, and because of the great demand throughout the country for this legislation, and because of the great developments of the country in these days, and because of the many changes that have come, perchance when a case goes to the Supreme Court under this act, that court may pay no attention to the Constitution, but may consider this legislation, not in the light of its constitutionality but in the light of whether or not it is desirable or popular legislation.

I have heard some of our courts criticized at times for making "popular" decisions, when changes have been made in certain lines of decisions. Whether those criticisms are fair or unfair I know not, but I have seen some cases in which it seemed to me that some of the courts must have had their ears a little close to the ground when they were writing those decisions. The court will not do that in this case, and we ought not to expect and nobody does expect that a great judicial body like the Supreme Court of the United States will stultify itself on the ground of what you might call a present political expediency and declare constitutional an act which is clearly unconstitutional. This court will not hold that the platform of a political party is higher than the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, the arguments that have been made and the authorities that have been cited by both sides all lead to the same conclusion—that this bill is absolutely unconstitutional. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] suggested a few minutes ago, if you define a mob as five persons you can define it as one. You talk about the necessity for this bill. You talk about the crying need for it and the crying shame of the 3,000 lynchings that have taken place in the past 30 years. You do not have the statistics before you as to the number of men who have been shot down, the number of men and women who have been killed by individuals, one or two or three or more. Have they not the right "to the equal protection of the law," as it is called here, just the same as the rapist or murderer who has been lynched?

It is true that it was not a mob who killed the man, but that man's life was taken unlawfully, and if the murderer is not apprehended, why not pass a bill making any kind of an unlawful killing a Federal offense, punishable in the Federal courts, and be done with it. If an act of Congress can stop the unlawful killing of a human being by a mob and has the constitutional authority to pass such an act, it can pass one against any unlawful killing, and in order to be consistent should do so. The number of persons who have been lynched will not compare with the number murdered or assassinated by one or more individuals and one is as much the ravishing of the law as the other. The human being, and his family, who has been murdered are as much entitled to "the equal protection of the law" as the one who has been lynched.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMINICK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is it not a fact that in many large cities the newspapers are full of statements as to the existence of great bands of criminals, whom those cities fail to bring to justice? Therefore would not this law be a precedent for bringing those cities under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government?

Mr. DOMINICK. I have no doubt of that. There is a great deal of lawlessness going on everywhere and throughout the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Would the gentleman like more time?

Mr. DOMINICK. I would like about five minutes more.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina five minutes additional.

Mr. DOMINICK. In this debate and in the hearings a great deal has been said about the South Carolina law. I am glad that finally there has been somebody, especially over on that side of the aisle, who could say something good for South Carolina and find some good in her. We are proud of our little State, and we think a great deal of her. South Carolina has that law on her statute books. It was put in our constitution in 1895, and it has been the law of the land since that time. Lynchings took place in South Carolina before the passage of that law, and lynchings have taken place there since them; and I have no doubt that if certain conditions and circumstances arise in the future there will possibly be other lynchings in South Carolina, just as there will be other lynchings in Ohio or Minnesota, or any other State, when the occasion and the necessity arises. The law of South Carolina provides that in the event of a lynching the family of the person lynched may bring suit against the county in which the lynching occurred and recover $2,000 damages. I think possibly three actions have been brought in South Carolina since that time under that law, and two or three of the cases went to the supreme court. The plaintiffs recovered the $2,000 and the supreme court sustained the constitutionality of the legislative act under which the suits were brought, and that is the law of the land in South Carolina to-day.

But I want to tell you something, my friends. My honest judgment, and it is the judgment of everybody else, I believe, in so far as lynching is concerned, is that that provision in the Constitution has no more to do in preventing it than if it were not there. If a mob aroused to frenzy by a heinous crime that has been committed and that mob apprehends the culprit of the deed, they are never going to stop to consider whether the county will be subject to a fine of $2,000 or $10,000 or $1,000,000 when they make up their minds to avenge a crime of the character that has been committed in my State or in your State. You can never stop it by legislation. We have not decreased lynching in South Carolina by legislation. It has been done more by enlightened public opinion. All lynching is repulsive to everybody. We have good officers, good sheriffs, and they take an oath when they go in to uphold the constitution of South Carolina and the Constitution of the United States, and to perform their duties according to law, and when these sheriffs get one of these prisoners, if they are able to get to him, he will do everything in his power, even to risking his own life, baring his own breast, to defend the prisoner when in his care. We always hear about those who are lynched, but we do not hear of the faithful officers who nearly every day and nearly every week are rushing off some culprit, who is threatened by a mob, to the State penitentiary or some place for safe-keeping. That is what we are doing to help enforce the law, and we are keeping it down by that kind of sentiment and that kind of work. [Applause.] I am satisfied that the passage of this bill, if it should become a law and is sustained, would not only not help conditions but if anything it would hurt them. We do not want any divided responsibility on this proposition. If the State is to look after this, let the responsibility rest on the State, and if the United States Government is to do it let them take the exclusive jurisdiction, and let the Federal officers look out for the enforcement of it. [Applause.]

The views of the minority of the Judiciary Committee are clearly, concisely, and briefly expressed and, in my opinion, are unanswerable.

They are:

This bill, in the judgment of the minority, is without constitutional warrant. It is definitely and directly antagonistic to the philosophy of our system of government, and within the limit of its effectiveness, if it should be held constitutional, would be destructive of that system.

If enacted and operative it would not add to the protection of person or the general efficiency of government, or strengthen the relationship between the Federal Government and the States. On the contrary, this proposed intervention of the Federal Government directed against local power, supplanting and superseding the sovereignty of the States, would tend to destroy that sense of local responsibility for the protection of person and property and the administration of justice, from which sense of local responsibility alone protection and governmental efficiency can be secured among free peoples.

This bill, challenging as it does the relative governmental efficiency of the States and the integrity of purpose of their governmental agencies, placing the Federal Government, as it does, in the attitude of an arbitrary dictator assuming coercive powers over the States, their officers, and their citizens in matters of local police control, would do incomparable injury to the spirit of mutual respect and trustful cooperation between the Federal Government and the States essential to the efficiency of government.

As a precedent, this bill, establishing the principles which it embodies and the congressional powers which it assumes to obtain, would strip the States of every element of sovereign power, control, and final responsibility for the personal and property protection of its citizens, and would all but complete the reduction of the States to a condition of governmental vassalage awaiting only the full exercise of the congressional powers established.

The time has come when we should think of the rights of the States and remember that under our form of government they are at least supposed to have some rights. Our Federal Government has been described as a sovereignty composed of sovereignties, but if we pass such legislation, with its consequent results, and lay down this principle and keep up this tendency of centralizing the powers of the Federal Government and depriving and divesting our States of their constitutional powers, it will not be long before our State legislatures will have no more powers than township commissioners, our State courts no more powers than justices of the peace or committing magistrates, and our governors only useful for entertainment and exhibition purposes.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had concurred in the following resolution with an amendment:

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2263. An act to amend the Federal reserve act, approved December 23, 1913.

ANTILYNCHING LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CHALMERS].

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped to have more time on this subject. I consider it of vital interest to the welfare and permanency of the Nation. Lincoln said that "the Nation can not exist one-half slave and one-half free." Neither can the Nation exist one-half lawless. I fear the evil effects of the crime of lynching upon the political and moral fiber of the Nation. The human mind manifests itself along three general lines—that of the intellect, the sensibilities, and the will. The sensibilities are the mainspring of human action. When an individual participates in or is a spectator in a mob of lynchers some of the powers and factors of the sensibilities are destroyed and can never be restored. So I am approaching this subject from the moral standpoint and the standpoint of the good of civilization.

The lynching and burning at the stake of human beings must be stopped. This is essential to the saving of civilization. I have been appalled at the record of the lynchings that have been reported and vouched for by the States and other authorities; the reports given out by some of the metropolitan newspapers, by Tuskegee Institute, by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, and by the governors and police authorities of many of the States.

I call your attention to the lynching of Mary Turner in Brooks and Lowndes Counties, Ga., in the summer of 1918. There is not in all the annals of human history so cruel, so barbarous, so inhuman, so revolting a crime as this lynching of Mary Turner. It included a list of some 10 or 12 colored people put to death by this fiendish mob in Georgia. I have read nothing, even in legendary history, in the records of prehistoric times, in the savagery practiced by the Indians of the West and the red men of the North, that will compare with the criminality of this disgrace to the State.

I also call your attention to the case of Henry Lowery, who was lynched within the year—to be exact, on January 26, 1921. The Memphis News announced that the lynching would be staged at a certain time and at a certain place, and the records show that this man was put to death by burning, chained to a stake, where a slow fire was kindled and that there were over 500 spectators. The sheriff who allowed him to be mobbed was said to have remarked that there was scarcely a man, woman, or child in the county that did not want to have him lynched.

I desire to call the attention of the opponents of this bill to the fact that Henry Lowery was not lynched for the crime of rape. There was a misunderstanding on the part of the farmer who hired him. A quarrel arose between him and his employee, and Henry Lowery shot the farmer, for which he ought to have been tried in a court of law and ought to have paid the penalty. Instead of that he was lynched, and the time and place of lynching advertised. He was taken into three different States. This horrible description of the barbarous lynching was published in the newspapers and sent broadcast into the homes of the community to be read by children and young people at the formative period of their lives.

In the early morning of a spring day of 1918 healthy, manly colored boys began to assemble in Washington Square, New York City. Thousands of them were formed in a military procession and marched up Fifth Avenue amid the cheering of the multitude. The places of business were decorated with the national emblem, and when they reached Murray Hill they were stopped in front of the Union Club, where the governor of the State descended, accompanied by his official retinue, and passed to this company of colored troops their colors and said to them that they should bring them back with honor.

The survivors of this company, some of them having paid the supreme sacrifice, came back to their country, bringing the colors with honor. They all offered their lives to save the world for democracy and to save the civil and personal freedom of every man, woman, and child in the United States. In the heart of hearts of these brave colored boys rested the hope that their acts of bravery would also free them and give them a little higher standing in the community in which they lived. They had the hope that while they were fighting to make the world safe for democracy and save civilization they might also win a little freedom for themselves. What has been the record? They were honorably discharged from the service, and within one year from the time they were discharged 10 of their number were lynched, not one of the 10 for rape. One of them was shot because he did not turn his conveyance out of the road in time to suit a company of white men who wanted to pass him. Another was lynched because an officer of the law attempted to arrest him while the officer was dressed in civilian clothes and the colored boy had on his Army uniform. When the officer laid his hands on the boy's shoulder and informed the boy he was under arrest the colored boy knocked the man down, saying that he should pay more respect to a military uniform. For this grave offense this boy was put to death by an infuriated mob to teach colored people that they must keep their place.

I am pleading with you to-day not only for justice for the black man, but that you must stamp out this crime of lynching, this travesty on civilization, or you yourselves, your children, and your children's children will pay the penalty in lower standards of living.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GAHN].

Mr. GAHN. Mr. Chairman, it was my privilege on April 25, 1921, to introduce in the House of Representatives a bill to prevent the crime of lynching and to punish those guilty of its perpetration. My bill was absorbed in the Dyer bill, under discussion, by the Judiciary Committee. It contained two distinct features: (1) The right to remove cases against persons accused of crime from the State to the Federal courts, where it is shown on account of race, nationality, or religion that accused is likely to be denied equal protection of the law; and (2) the forfeiture of $10,000 by the county wherein a lynching or mob murder takes place, together with the forfeiture by a county of such amount in which territory the mob may have operated.

The committee has seen fit to omit the first feature of my bill, but incorporated the second in this bill. Half a loaf being better than none satisfies not only myself but a great mass of citizens in my district and city whose relatives and people are jeopardized by the infernal and fiendish practice of mob murder and lynching.

I have listened intently to those gentlemen, Members of this House, who seek to justify this heinous and atrocious punishment meted to colored persons and others under the guise of State rights with impatience. It is beyond my powers of imagination to determine how any American can expect to absolve himself from a guilty conscience in arguing against this antilynching bill. They, in subterfuge, maintain it is unconstitutional.

For shame! Why, the very essence of our grand old Constitution is founded upon liberty and justice. In the revered Declaration of Independence it is declared that all men are, and of a right ought to be, free and equal. All are born equal; the qualities attendant upon birth are beyond any mortal control, and it illy becomes Members of this House to paraphrase our Constitution so as to justify their hearts' desire.

That desire is the perpetuation of the supposed right to lynch. It does not emanate from the largest part of our country, but is mostly confined to those living in certain sections. Those having and exposing that desire, I have noticed, are Representatives from that part of the United States whose constituents are anticolored and always have been. On examining the list of minority Members of the House you will find that not more than 20 represent States outside the so-called South. In the wonderful landslide of 1920 nearly every other one of the minority were elected with this anticolored constituency.

Their arguments teem with resentment that we should through this bill interfere with lynching in their States. They forget that the North, too, has a large colored population. If their conclusions that this practice is necessary to prevent atrocious assaults, why is it that in the Northern States no such practice is, with little exception, indulged in? True, there have been lynchings in nearly all States, but the Northern and Western States have been ever alert to stop it and to punish those indulging in it.

Of course, some of them say they deplore lynching in their States, and they further state that if let alone their States will eventually prevent it. If their speed of prevention is gauged by the past, unaccelerated, it will take a thousand years for them to make good their predictions.

The arguments and claims of the minority are contradictory. They would permit lynching to go on whenever and wherever their constituents, in a furiated mob assembled, demanded the life of some unprotected and, in many cases, innocent person who had aroused their anger and animal instincts.

The deplorable thing, too, is that these lynchings have occurred on the least pretext. If it were done as a punishment to avenge some serious offense there might be some plausability to their argument. But statistics show that of the total lynchings in the past 30 years but 28 per cent were for rape and attacks upon women. The others were solely on account of race prejudice. The shame is augmented by the fact that in many cases the victims were colored men who had fought for our flag.

Only yesterday the newspapers carried a story of a colored man in Toronto, Canada, whom the State officials of North Carolina desire brought back to that State to answer a charge of "inciting a riot." His brother has been lynched for the same offense, and now this very State desires further satisfaction in the life of this man. Think of a State allowing its offices to be used for such a purpose. Think of a colored man being lynched for inciting a riot. The chances are that the whites started the trouble and are now accusing this colored man. I hope the State Department will never permit him to be taken back to the doom awaiting him.

This shows as clearly as can be shown that those States and their white population have the lingering desire and hope that lynching may go on unmolested by the United States Government. Not only that, but talk to most any southerner and you will soon find out that the desire for the continuance of this practice is of long standing; raised and bred into them, so to speak.

We must not listen to the argument that these States do not permit lynching, that it is the fault of local officers and not the State governments themselves. Because there are no laws in those States authorizing lynching does not prove such contention. Look at their election and franchise laws. All are so adroitly framed that the colored citizen is deprived of his elective franchise. If it were lawful the whites of those States would so draft their lynching laws.

Oh, they say public sentiment is changing in the South. Since when, and how much? Even though there has been some change, and though there were fewer lynchings last year, yet the potential desire to lynch is still rampant and liable to break out at any time. Let us have this law enacted. If the sentiment against lynching is what they say it is becoming, this law can do no harm. If it is not what they say, it will do a world of good.

Let us not forget the principles of our forefathers. Let us go forward, as they marched forward, even to battle for that which is right. Let us not be afraid of our Constitution; let us use it as our guide. It points the way; let us follow. Let us wrap its protection around those who may suffer at the hands of mobs. Let us see whether the fourteenth amendment can be observed and enforced.

Constitutionality? Since when did Members of this House fear so much that bills passed by it are to be prejudged unconstitutional? Opinions of the Attorney General's office hold that this bill is in pursuance of the Constitution. Eminent Members of this body, including the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], show us that it is constitutional.

But what of it, either way? There is a tribunal established under that same Constitution to determine such questions. In the final analysis the Supreme Court can alone determine it.

Meanwhile we should do our duty. Fear not a rupture of the South. We will never have another Civil War. But we must not, we shall not, recant from that noble stand for which that war was fought. That war was fought to perpetuate liberty and justice. This bill insures those grand principles of justice for which so many lives were sacrificed. Their sacrifices shall not have been in vain.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, I propose to speak upon the policy of this bill. I want to address myself to some arguments that have been made against the policy of it.

Before proceeding with what I have prepared to say, I want to pay my respects to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY]. Attacking the policy of this measure, the gentleman proclaimed at the outset that the Republican Party owes no obligation to the Negro element in our citizenship. At once the ungenerous intimation was made over here that the speech had been written by the esteemed gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] in charge of the opposition to this bill. I hasten to repel the suggestion. I absolve the gentleman from Texas. He has marked capabilities, but he is wholly incapable of a statement so shocking to the sensibilities of all of us as that. The Democratic Party has never assumed responsibility for the unhappy pitiable political plight of the Negro race in our citizenship; but neither the able gentleman leading the minority side against this bill, nor any other Democrat, will stand in his place in this debate and declare that even the Democratic Party is without obligation to the Negroes of this country. But the gentleman from Maine did not stop there. He interpreted the plank of his party's platform as rank hypocrisy. He argues that the Chicago plank against lynching was made to placate, not to pledge.

He says the Republican Party has not declared war on lynching; that no legislation was promised; that the Chicago plank simply means that to fool those who asked for legislation a commission is to be created to go about the country and implore lynchers not to lynch. In effect, the gentleman argues that what is needed is to launch a peace ship, to send out another Argonaut and "have the boys out of the trenches before Christmas."

Mr. Chairman, the people of the gentleman's constituency may yet learn something about the Chicago convention. They may yet learn that this plank in the Chicago platform was in response to a rising tide of public opinion; was born of public protest of the decent, law-abiding people in all parts of this great country; that the demand made upon that convention was that war be declared upon this evil; that Federal means be devised to eradicate lynching and save our civilization. I want to say to the gentleman that if his interpretation of the Chicago platform be accepted, if his advice to his colleagues on the majority side shall be followed, his party and my party will be guilty of a dastardly breach of faith and he and we will soon learn whether the Republican Party owes any obligations to the Negro voters and Negro people of this country. I commend to the gentlemen the study of the census of two years ago. From that study he may learn something about this race, the power of which he contemns and the rights of which he would ignore. I presume that there are few, if any, Negroes in the gentleman's district. Negroes have made some mistakes in their migrations, but I have not known that they have made the mistake of going there. But the gentleman may learn from the census that there are hundreds of thousands of Negroes in Kansas, Missouri, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, and West Virginia; that in these States these people, as is the case in the Southern States, are contributing to an industrial development; that they are making progress in all the ways and along all the lines so eloquently portrayed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]; that they are to be found in great numbers where they are most needed in this country, on the farms, and in agricultural pursuits; that in the State of Missouri alone farm lands assessed at more than $16,000,000 are owned and farmed by Negro farmers.

Will the gentleman put this debate upon the lowest possible level, the level of mere party political expediency? Let me tell him something more for his enlightenment. In many communities, congressional districts, and some States of the area I have mentioned, Negro voters hold to-day the balance of power. Will the gentleman argue that the Republican Party owes no obligation whatever to these people? Shades of the immortals! Shades of Blaine and Reed and Hale and the rest of them—giants in their day in these legislative halls; lights in the counsels of the Republican Party! What is the matter with our friend anyhow? Is the gentleman preparing campaign material for Democratic use in the approaching campaign?

The gentleman in his speech makes special appeals over and over again to the Republican majority. Let me say to him that the best appeal he can make to the Republican majority is that they keep faith with the people, with all classes and conditions of people in this country.

Mr. Chairman, this legislative proposal has had the effect of a depth bomb dropped in our midst. The deeps of partisan and sectional feeling have been thrown into violent commotion. When a proposal produces such a result, one who has convictions in regard to it, and at the same time seeks to respect the sensibilities of his fellows in this body, is prompted to weigh his judgments and measure his words. Such a bill, however, demands straight thinking and justifies plain speaking. It will serve no useful purpose for either side of this Chamber to try to dodge responsibilities, conceal facts, befog the real issues, or undertake to create unreal issues. I agree with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] that it serves no useful purpose in a debate of this kind to beat around the bush.

From the point of view of the gentlemen of the minority who have spoken against this bill, this proposal has been diabolically conceived, diabolically born, and will be diabolically matured into law by the diabolical partisanship of a diabolical majority. No one over here will have forgotten how the gentleman [Mr. SUMNERS] flouted us of the majority as a veritable mob—madness, rope, and all other accessories—but had the good taste to say it all with a smile. We, of course, can never know whether our other friends of the unspoken speeches, while indicting, prosecuting, convicting, and hanging the Republican Party for high treason have really smiled or, following an illustrious example, looked grim and hurled inkstands. But, Mr. Chairman, the spirit of this proposal is not the spirit of a mob. It partakes no more of the mob spirit than does the very determined opposition to the bill. Let us face the situation squarely. There are two reasons why we can not reason together calmly and patriotically in this Committee of the Whole House upon this measure. They should be frankly stated and frankly recognized. This bill comes here as a party measure—conceived of a declared party policy, born of the urge of an administration program. There is no more partisanship in it, there is probably less partisanship in this measure than there has been in any other of the distinctive party and administration measures that have been presented to this Congress. The policy of this measure, of the enactment of a law to suppress lynching, has emanated from a rising tide of popular sentiment the country wide and the country over. There has been for some years a growing and persistent demand throughout the country that the National Government tackle this national evil.

I will not discuss the evidence of this in detail, but if anyone will read the matter my colleague [Mr. DYER] has inserted in the record of this debate, he will be convinced not only of the demand but that the demand was quite as insistent and almost as general in the South as in any other part of the country. In 1920 the Republican Party was out of power. It was appealing to the American people to be put back into power. As a part of that appeal to voters it engaged to grapple—held out assurance that a Republican Congress would grapple—with this monstrous evil. This bill is the effort of the Republican Party now in power to keep faith. Now, why and where does the shoe pinch? The shoe pinches because our brethren of the minority, fine gentlemen all of them, smart politicians, clearly see and realize that if this bill shall be perfected, shall be enacted into law, and shall work—shall be effective in suppressing in some substantial degree the lynching evil—the Republican Party will profit, just as a political party always profits that keeps faith with the people in doing things that ought to be done. But that is not all. It is just as clearly seen that if the Republican Party should make no effort, or if, making the effort, shall fail in this program, it will suffer loss, just as a party always suffers loss when it breaks faith or fails to keep faith with the people. So the spirit that is troubling the waters here is not the spirit of a mob; it is the spirit of the politician. The party responsible for what is done or what is not done is not to be stampeded by threats. Gentlemen of the minority, in the play of politics, may prance before us, call us names and apply epithets, we shall not be perturbed if only they do not forget to smile.

But, Mr. Chairman, they tell us in thunder tones that this proposal is unconstitutional. It may be, in little part or big part or altogether. As I said at the beginning, I am disposed to discuss the policy of this proposal. I shall be troubled neither by the constitutionality question nor by my duty under my oath with respect to the measure until it is perfected here. The people want something done, and so help me, so far as I am concerned, the opponents of this bill must marshal some other argument beside the old, pestiferous bugaboo of State rights. I demand to be shown that my National Government has not the inherent right and power to protect its citizens from mobs and to preserve its very life and conserve its civilization.

But there is another reason why the waters are troubled. They remind us that the platform plank announcing the policy of this legislation was written at the behest of the Negroes in our citizenship. That is absolutely true. Negro men and Negro women, associated together not to promote the welfare of a political party but to promote the welfare of their race, did appeal for the plank that was put into the Chicago platform. In God's name why should they have not appealed there? Is it not disclosed in this report, has it not been admitted, directly or indirectly, by all who have participated in this debate, that the indescribable cruelties, the barbarous iniquities of the lynching evil flame forth in peculiar, divest fury against that unhappy people? Ah, Mr. Chairman, here is introduced the consideration major in the minds of the opponents of this bill, the consideration which has been insinuated into the debate by every gentleman who has spoken on the minority side, the consideration which it is painfully manifest will divide this House upon a party line upon this bill. That consideration is the race question. Mr. Chairman, if this is to be characterized as a partisan measure it will be because the minority makes it so. If it be true, let it be recognized that the division upon this bill will reflect the respective attitudes, the opposing attitudes of the Republican Party and the Democratic Party toward a racial group within our citizenship. But, Mr. Chairman, I will not admit, for I do not believe, that the gentleman from Texas or others on that side are fair or just toward their constituencies. Their speeches do not reflect the best, the most influential, or the dominating sentiment of southern people either toward the Negro race or toward the policy of this bill. The correctness of the views of these gentlemen is not attested by leading southern newspapers, educators, religionists, jurists, and public men generally. However the politicians of the South may care or fail to care about the millions of the Negro race there, there is being shaped in the minds and purposes of far-seeing, far-thinking men and women of that section policies industrial, educational, cultural—yea, political—both for the immediate and the more remote destiny of that people. The point I make against the argument of these gentlemen is that they would make lynching an essential and would have us believe that by the people of the South it is thought to be an essential to policies toward that people.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say it in all kindness, for I have no other feeling than that toward these gentlemen. I have come to know the gentleman who spoke with such force and feeling here [Mr. SUMNERS] personally and to prize his friendship highly. But I can not interpret some of the arguments contained in these speeches, to which I have referred, against the policy of this bill to mean aught else or to have other significance than that to strike down lynching would be to deprive southern communities of a recognized and tolerated instrumentality for dealing with their Negro population. I can not believe that to be true. To believe it one must judge those communities by the baser elements which exist there, as they exist in communities elsewhere. I inveigh against such judgment just as the Negroes of this country inveigh against judgments upon the standing, character, and attainments of their race by reference to the weak, the criminal, or the degenerate among them.

Since this bill has been under consideration many of us—perhaps all of us—have had our memories refreshed by a newspaper account of a lynching which occurred during the year which just closed. Listen to a few sentences from the report of it:

> More than 500 persons stood by and looked on while the Negro was slowly burned to a crisp. * * * He suffered one of the most horrible deaths imaginable. * * * Chained to a log, members of the mob placed a small pile of leaves around his feet. Gasoline was then put on the leaves and the carrying out of the death sentence was under way. Inch by inch the Negro was fairly cooked to death. Every few minutes fresh leaves were tossed on the funeral pyre until the flames had passed the Negro's waist. Once or twice he attempted to pick up the hot ashes and thrust them in his mouth in order to hasten death. Each time the ashes were kicked out of his reach by a member of the mob.

Was such torture ever more brutally applied to a human being by savagest savages or most barbaric barbarians? The victim of this diabolical treatment had committed murder. Law disregarded, courts contemned, officers defied, the murderer in turn was murdered.

Where there had been one murderer there was now 500 murderers. Can anyone believe, will anyone argue here, that such a demonstration, such horrible indulgence of criminal impulses, could possibly serve or be held in any community to serve as a deterrent of crime? If there be one, I pity his mental processes, and I pity his judgment. I ask of anyone, if, indeed, there be one who may be disposed to be tolerant of lynching for any crime or under any circumstances, can you conceive of any evil in that or any other community the iniquitous roots of which could possibly sink deeper or spread more widely?

The direct output of that lynching, as it is of every lynching, was the murder of a criminal to avenge a crime. But what of the by-products? We are far too prone to judge the outlaw practice by the direct output—to stress the quick destruction of a criminal or a degenerate. But lynching is an expanding, self-diversifying evil. The hellish thing grows by what it feeds upon. It balefully spreads, ramifies, and breeds new iniquities. The direct output is horrible, merciless murder by infuriated, irresponsible mobs. The by-products have always been and always will be more far-reaching, more fraught with danger to society and to the body politic than the direct output. The animating, compelling spirit of the lynching mob stifles every dictate of the nobler humanities. It works utter demoralization of participants and onlookers. It lowers the moral standards of communities, breathes contempt of law, utter defiance of authority, and a reckless challenge of established order. Can any one of us persuade himself that even if infractions of private rights, however sacred, might be so deterred, a public wrong so fundamentally grave and menacing should be countenanced or permitted? The policy and doctrine of this measure is that to face such a menace to free institutions, to avert such danger, to stay such peril, the National Government should stretch every nerve, strain every ligament of inherent or delegated constitutional power. To that policy and purpose I heartily subscribe.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, I would not on any slight consideration inject the Federal Government into State activities, but it does seem to me that after a period of 30 years' trial under State laws and State officials, during which time there have been 3,000 cases of lynchings and no punishment, as far as I can find out, of the guilty individuals who participated in the lynching, the time has come to demand a change. It seems to me we are confronted with a condition that requires us to say that existing agencies for law and order have failed to work and that the State and local authorities now vested with the responsibility of enforcing the law are unable to function in the case of a lynching.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Does the gentleman think it would be a good idea for the Federal Government to inject its policy into the situation out there in California on the Pacific coast with respect to the Japanese and the Chinese?

Mr. SWING. I would say that if there were cases of lynching of the Japanese, I would agree. My State, I frankly confess, has not been an innocent State in the matter of lynchings, but I think that a great majority of those cases happened in the days of '49, before law and order and courts were carried into the far West. Since law and order and the courts have been instituted as the instrumentality for the punishment of crime it seems to me that no fair man to-day can defend the act of lynching. Nor do I believe there are any who do, even in the South, and I refer to the South, not because the South is defending lynching. It is not. The best men are attempting to stamp out lynching, but the instrumentalities through which they are working are ineffectual for the purpose?

I think this is the the reason why they are ineffectual. Lynching, as we understand it, is mob violence. It is the thought of the community crystallized into action. The whole community has the feeling which a few men finally carry into action, but they would not have carried it into action if the whole community were not thinking the thing which they finally did. How can you expect the grand jury of a country to pass judgment upon its own neighbors when they as well as their neighbors and those who commit the deed are infected with the virus which brought about the act of lynching? How can you expect the local sheriff or the local judge, whose office is given by the votes of their neighbors, to turn around and take any drastic action against them?

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWING. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. Does the gentleman conceive how the result would be widely different with the Federal jury from what it would be with a local jury, both coming from the same section?

Mr. SWING. Yes; I do. The Federal district attorney and the judge are responsible to a different authority. They are not dependent upon the suffrage of the people of the community. The Federal grand jury is drawn from a much wider community than just the county in which the act is committed. That is the hope of the present law, that by a change of venue you can get a different set of authorities and a different community to draw your jury from—one that is not poisoned with the same virus which has poisoned the local community and brought about the very act of violence which the authorities are supposed to suppress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, answering my friend from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW], who just propounded a question as to what different results would be obtained under a Federal than under a State statute, by change of venue, I would say that I have only to point to the Williams case in his own State, where, by change of venue, the State authorities themselves were able to obtain a conviction.

Mr. UPSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. I answer the gentleman with all cheerfulness that that does not disprove my contention. The ideals of the people are the same. They know the suffering through which we have passed, and the result, so far as the verdict is concerned, can not be changed by a change of venue. Besides, Williams was tried in that county where he committed the crime and was convicted.

Mr. SIEGEL. My information is to the contrary; but I am always glad to yield to my friend from Georgia, if such be the fact. Let us take the State of Georgia. The number of counties in that State is very large in proportion to those in other States. The population in each county is small, comparatively, so that everyone in the county practically knows everyone else. There has been very little immigration into that State, probably about 2 per cent, as I get it from the census figures. It is a natural desire upon the part of friends not to convict friends, if they can avoid it. I have figures before me taken from the New York Tribune, which show that the State of Georgia has had the largest number of lynchings. I do not know whether the responsibility rests upon the courts or not, but we are not confronted with a theory; we are confronted with a fact, which is that despite all of the best sentiments throughout the State of Georgia and all that it has done to obtain respect for law, the lynchings have increased in number.

What is the proposed remedy under this bill? We all know that nearly every man and woman in the United States who stands for good citizenship is absolutely opposed to lynching. I know that to be the fact in the State of Georgia, as well as in every other part of the country. I am not discussing it from a sectional standpoint. It is my belief that if the sheriff of the county or any other person having in custody one who has committed a crime knows that he will be brought to trial in the Federal court if he fails to perform his duty, which court would be held away from the particular community in which the crime was committed, he would realize the responsibility of his position and uphold the oath he has taken to uphold the law.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman favor subjecting to Federal control the 10,000 policemen of the city of New York?

Mr. SIEGEL. The Federal courts already have taken control under the eighteenth amendment.

Mr. WINGO. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but the eighteenth amendment is an amendment to the Constitution. My question is whether or not the gentleman favors placing the 10,000 policemen of the city of New York under Federal control for any purpose.

Mr. SIEGEL. They are under Federal control for the enforcement of the laws, assisting the United States marshal all of the time.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman favor putting them under the control of the Federal courts?

Mr. SIEGEL. No; I do not. But in New York we make a distinction between the sheriff and the police department, which is not the case in other places.

Mr. WINGO. But they are both police officers.

Mr. SIEGEL. They are both police officers, but with a certain distinct line of duty.

Mr. WINGO. The sheriff is the police officer of the county.

Mr. SIEGEL. Not in New York City.

Mr. WINGO. The old sheriff was.

Mr. SIEGEL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The sheriff from time immemorial has been the chief peace officer of the particular subdivision. I want to ask the gentleman another question. As I understand, there were sixty and some odd lynchings last year in the United States.

Mr. SIEGEL. More than that, according to the report in the New York Tribune here. It was a large number.

Mr. WINGO. Say 160, just for illustration. What, according to the gentleman's idea, is the correct standard on this or any other crime—because lynching is not the only crime you are punishing; murder is not the only invasion of a man's constitutional right? Where does the dividing line come, where there are a certain number of crimes in the city of New York that are committed, and, as the opponents of this bill contend, those crimes are permitted by the State, what particular number would you establish as saying that whenever those crimes are committed would cause the Federal Government to step in?

Mr. SIEGEL. We are not establishing any particular number in this bill.

Mr. WINGO. I have not made myself clear. What particular number of crimes that are committed in a State would cause you to think made it necessary for the Federal Government to step in?

Mr. SIEGEL. I am not discussing the particular number of crimes——

Mr. WINGO. I am asking the gentleman for information.

Mr. SIEGEL. I do not stand by the question of a number. We know the Federal Government has had to step into a particular State and uphold the government of that particular State, namely, West Virginia. But that is not the question. It must be based on the last words of the fourteenth amendment:

> Nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

I do not pretend for a moment that all the provisions of this bill are constitutional, according to my interpretation of the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. WINGO. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

Mr. SIEGEL. It is my opinion that we can not hold a prosecutor liable, because he is the one that has to determine for himself whether there is sufficient evidence to be presented to the grand jury or not.

Mr. WINGO. I fear the gentleman thinks I am trying to get into a controversy with him.

Mr. SIEGEL. Oh, no.

Mr. WINGO. A good many men have raised this question in private conversation. What is the dividing line? In the failure of a State, as you contend, to afford protection, it is a denial of protection. To what extent must we go before the State loses its jurisdiction and the Federal Government, by the adoption of accretion or nonuser, or some of these other strange doctrines, assumes jurisdiction?

Mr. SIEGEL. It is the sole question of whether the Federal court will have jurisdiction to sustain the law under the first section of the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. WINGO. How many men were murdered by gunmen in New York last year that were not punished?

Mr. SIEGEL. Very few.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman tell me how many women were assaulted within the District of Columbia and near-by villages in the last two years and the assailants were never punished? Would the gentleman favor the Federal Government stepping in there?

Mr. SIEGEL. One question at a time. First, let us have the editorial read, and I will then allude to the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman having the editorial read in his time? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, Jan. 10, 1922.]

CONTRASTS IN HOMICIDES.

Current statistics show extraordinary variations in the numbers of homicides in the chief cities and a remarkable parallel between the numbers of homicides and the numbers of lynchings.

Thus in Atlanta in 1920 lynchings were at the ratio of 40.9 to the 100,000 population, and in Savannah they were at the rate of 44 to the 100,000, and in Georgia in the last 35 years there were 528 lynchings. In Charleston homicides were at the rate of 36.5 and there were 121 lynchings in South Carolina. Memphis had 63.4 homicides to the 100,000, and Tennessee a total of 198 lynchings. In New Orleans the homicide rate was 16.9, and in Louisiana the number of lynchings was 289.

On the other hand, in Baltimore the homicide rate was only 7 to the 100,000, and the number of lynchings in Maryland was only 23. Cincinnati had 5.7 homicides, and Ohio had 20 lynchings. Milwaukee had a homicide rate of 3, and Wisconsin had only 5 lynchings. San Francisco's homicide rate was 7.6, and California's lynchings were 33. In New York City homicides in 1920 were 5.9 to the 100,000, and in New York State in 35 years there were only 2 lynchings. In Philadelphia the homicides were 6.2, and in Pennsylvania the lynchings were only 6. In Boston the homicide rate was 5.1, and Massachusetts had not a single lynching.

In the face of such figures is it impossible to ignore a very direct relationship between the lynching habit and the commission of homicide. New York City has a mixed and largely turbulent population, and has more homicides than it should have. Yet it has, in proportion to its population, only about one-seventh as many as Atlanta. And in New York State there have been only 2 lynchings in 35 years, while in Georgia, with a far smaller population, there have been 528. Such a contrast explodes the claim that lynching is a crime deterrent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. HAWES. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. SIEGEL. I have one question to answer, asked by my friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. I understood the gentleman's editorial was intended to be an answer, and that the mathematical ratio mentioned there determined jurisdiction.

Mr. SIEGEL. Now the gentleman is not serious.

Mr. WINGO. I thought that was the question.

Mr. SIEGEL. The gentleman asked me about New York, and the editorial answered the fact as to the proportion of lynchings in other States.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman tell me what in his opinion is the proportion of crime that causes the State to lose jurisdiction and gives it to the Federal Government?

Mr. SIEGEL. There is one question that has got to be determined, and that is what is meant by denying a person within the jurisdiction of the State the equal protection of the law. I will say for the benefit of the gentleman that there have been some six hundred and odd cases under the fourteenth amendment which have come to the Supreme Court of the United States. There have been only 35 or 36 cases which did not involve the question of property rights. In these cases the court divided along two lines. In the cases where evidence was brought before a jury in the State court to the effect that equal rights and privileges were not granted, the Federal court took jurisdiction.

In the other case where it was offered it was a mere expression of opinion; the Federal court declined to assume jurisdiction. It seems to me the only case that could be referred to in regard to the whole question is the case that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] so ably discussed yesterday, and that is the case of Strauder v. West Virginia (100 U. S., 203). I am not saying that there is any authoritative decision in the Supreme Court holding that this proposed law is constitutional or not. I have searched in vain for a case squarely determining the question.

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to note the history of the fourteenth amendment. It was first introduced in the House by Thaddeus Stevens, on December 5, 1865. Just previous to that, on March 3, 1865, the Freedman's Bureau was created. The civil rights act was adopted on April 9, 1866. Then came the Ku Klux act, which was passed April 20, 1871, in the second session of the Forty-first Congress. It was intended thereby to enforce all of the provisions of section 1 of the fourteenth amendment.

On March 1, 1875, the civil rights act became a law (U. S. Stat. L., vol. 18, p. 335). Originally the measure was introduced by Charles Sumner, but it was not until Benjamin F. Butler took charge that it became a law. It was proposed thereby to wipe out the color line in the South and give to the Negro equal privileges in public conveyances by land and by water and in all hotels. The Supreme Court of the United States held that it was only a guaranty for the protection of individuals from the invasion by the States themselves. It was thus rendered of no effect as far as defending one citizen against the activities of his fellow citizens.

Three times did the Supreme Court of the United States pass on this question: In 1875, when the decision of United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542) was rendered; again in 1883, when the Civil Rights cases were decided (109 U. S., p. 3); and later, in 1906, a decision was rendered in Hodges v. United States (203 U. S., p. 1). The deductions to be made from the decisions so far is to the effect that the only time when use can be made of the amendment is when there is proof that there is discrimination solely on the ground of race or color. There is no presumption that the discrimination is on that ground. The party aggrieved must present convincing proof to that effect. Everyone knows that it is practically impossible to prove what was running through the minds of the officials when acting. The surprising feature of the whole fourteenth amendment is that when enacted it was intended to protect personal rights. As I previously stated, in a little over 600 cases which have come up to the Supreme Court of the United States, about 565 involved the question of property rights. The balance involved the question of liberty or personal rights of the individual.

That the Federal Government should, if the Constitution permits it, have some jurisdiction to protect individual residents of the United States is not to be denied.

Something must be done to eradicate the desire to violate and to take the law into one's own hands. No excuse can be offered for the lynching of 64 women, 11 white and 53 colored, between the period of 1889 to January 1, 1921. Certainly it can not be claimed that the charge of rape was behind these lynchings. One has but to take a glance at the figures of lynchings, which are as follows, and see at once the necessity of the passage of some legislation along these lines. They are for the benefit of the country at large:

State.	Number of lynchings, 1889–1918.	Number of lynchings, 1918–1921.	Total lynched.	Number of women lynched.
Georgia	387	43	429	6

The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] made some inquiries in regard to crime in the District of Columbia. The following letter is self-explanatory.

The population of the District of Columbia on January 1, 1920, was, according to the census of 1920, 437,571. The population of the city during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921, was about 415,000, on account of the number of Government employees who have been discharged.

For the information of the House I insert the following letter:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
METROPOLITAN POLICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., January 4, 1922.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: In response to your communication of the 3d instant, I give below statistics requested for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921:

Arrests for felonies	2,618
Arrests for misdemeanors	53,974
Total	56,592
Males	51,911
Females	4,681
Native born	52,809
Foreign born	3,783

Very truly, yours,

DANL. SULLIVAN,
Acting Major and Superintendent.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 20, 1921.

Hon. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 13, 1921, in which you state that you understand that there are a number of cases pending in which requests have been made by foreign Governments that compensation be paid to the family of aliens who have been killed in the United States, and request that you be furnished with a statement of the facts regarding such cases so that you may refer to them in urging the passage of H. R. 13, entitled "A bill to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching."

The bill to which you refer apparently relates to cases which involve the murder by a mob or riotous assemblage of persons within the jurisdiction of the several States. I beg to state that there are no cases pending before the department concerning which representations have been made by foreign Governments with regard to the payment of indemnities to the relatives of aliens who were killed under such circumstances. Representations have been made, however, by the Japanese Government with regard to the payment of indemnities to the relatives of Tatsuji Satio, a Japanese subject, who on May 16, 1916, was killed at San Geronimo, Mexico, by American soldiers, and to the family of Torahachi Uratake, who was killed in November, 1915, at Schofield Barracks, Hawaii, through the gross carelessness of an American soldier. Both of these cases have on more than one occasion been brought to the attention of Congress. The facts concerning the death of Tatsuji Saito are set forth in House Document No. 194, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, and in House Document No. 1108, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session. The facts in the case of Torahachi Uratake may be found in House Document No. 785, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session.

As of possible interest to you in considering the provisions of the bill in question, I may state that the British ambassador at Washington, in a note of October 25, 1921, made inquiry of the department with regard to the assault committed upon the person of Rev. Philip S. Irwin, a British subject, on July 17, 1921, at Miami, Fla. This matter is being given consideration by the department.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
For the Secretary of State: HENRY P. FLETCHER, Undersecretary.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama, Judge JOHN R. TYSON, was compelled to leave the city a few days ago on account of very important business. He had prepared an argument in opposition to the pending anti-lynching bill, which he had hoped to deliver in person, but was prevented from doing so on account of being called away. We all know that Judge TYSON is a great lawyer and that he served with great distinction and ability on the bench in his own State of Alabama as circuit judge and as associate justice and as chief justice of the supreme court. I have read this argument, and to my mind it is one of the ablest constitutional arguments I have read in opposition to this bill, and it fully sustains the splendid reputation of Judge TYSON as a great lawyer and a distinguished jurist. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to insert it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that he may insert Mr. TYSON'S remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman approve the sentiments expressed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I most certainly do.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The speech is as follows:

Mr. TYSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the title of this bill is—

To assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching.

Conformable and germane to the title, the bill seeks to invoke the police powers of the Federal Government for the suppression of and punishment of murder.

The first section seeks to extend the guaranty of the fourteenth amendment, prohibiting the State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws to the violent acts of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life, without authority of law, as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

The second section undertakes to define or, rather, to declare that the failure, neglect, or refusal of any State or governmental subdivision thereof to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage shall be deemed a denial of the equal protection of the law within the guaranty of the amendment.

The third makes it a felony for any State or municipal officer charged with the duty or possessing the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, and fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable effort to protect such person from death, or any such officer charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in such mob or riotous assemblage who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to apprehend or prosecute to final judgment under the laws of such State all persons so participating in the mob or riotous assemblage; and also punishes any person participating in a mob or riotous assemblage who takes from the custody of any State or municipal officer a prisoner charged with the commission of a public offense and puts such prisoner to death or who participates in obstructing or preventing any State or municipal officer in the discharge of his duty to apprehend, prosecute, protect, or punish any person suspected of or charged with any public offense and puts such person to death.

The fourth section fixes the punishment, on conviction, of imprisonment in the penitentiary of any person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death.

The fifth section imposes a penalty upon the county in which the death occurred, by a mob or riotous assemblage, of $10,000, recoverable in the United States court, for the use of the family, if any, of the person put to death; if he had no family, then for the use of his dependent parents, if any; otherwise for the use of the United States. It also makes it the duty of the United States district attorney to prosecute the claim against the county, and confers jurisdiction upon the court by appropriate processes to enforce the collection of the judgment.

The sixth section makes any and all counties liable if the person put to death is transported through them after his capture and before being put to death.

The constitutionality of this bill I challenge as being beyond the power of Congress to enact into a law.

THE STATES HAVE NEVER SURRENDERED THEIR RIGHTS TO PUNISH MURDERERS UNDER THEIR OWN LAWS.

It differs in no material respect from others, save in one particular, that relating to State or municipal officers, which have been declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States.

I shall first discuss that portion of the bill which seeks to punish the individuals who may be guilty of the acts denounced as not being within the guaranty afforded by the equal protection clause of the fourteenth amendment. The attempt to punish the individuals is the invocation of the exercise of the police powers by the Federal Government never delegated to it by the States. The bill is an invocation of the exercise by Congress of its power of legislation upon subjects which are exclusively within the domain of State legislation, an attempt to create a code of municipal laws for the regulation of private rights and not to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when acting under State authority. I do not wish to be understood as asserting that positive rights are not secured by the amendment, but they are secured only by way of prohibition against State laws and proceedings. And while Congress undoubtedly has the power to carry such prohibition into effect by legislation, such legislation must be predicated upon some supposed State law or State proceeding and directed to the correction of their operation and effect.

It is State action and not individual lawlessness, however heinous or revolting, over which jurisdiction is conferred by the amendment upon Congress to correct by legislation.

The power or authority conferred upon Congress by the amendment is to enact restraining legislation upon powers exercised by the States denying to persons equal protection of the laws. The amendment originated no new privileges or immunities, no new right of life, liberty, or property, and no new process of law. It does no more than to guarantee rights already existing under the Constitution. It confers upon Congress no authority to enact general legislation securing the rights of life, liberty, and property, but to enact only such legislation as may be necessary to counteract such laws as the States may enact, which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from enacting and enforcing.

The amendment is not an affirmative, positive, original grant of power to the Federal Government, nor does it confer upon Congress the power of enacting original legislation over privileges and immunities, life, liberty, or property. To repeat, it is prohibitory only, and the prohibition runs against the State and not against individuals. It differs in this respect from other grants of the States found in the Constitution, such as the right to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, to coin money, to declare war, and similar grants. Those are affirmative grants of power, and Congress, for their regulation and enforcement, has jurisdiction to enact original, affirmative legislation of every kind, including the exercise of the police power where necessary to their enforcement. The grant by the States of those powers was a surrender by them of all power to legislate upon those subjects, conferring exclusively upon Congress that right. The States never surrendered their right to govern and regulate the rights of life, liberty, and property and to punish, under their own laws, murderers. If that power exists in the States it can not exist in the Federal Government. And if the States have surrendered that power by the adoption of the fourteenth amendment, then Congress has the exclusive right to fix the punishment which should be imposed upon murderers, and if upon murderers, upon robbers, thieves, burglars, embezzlers, forgers, bigamists, adulterers, and every other person who may commit a criminal offense.

If, by the adoption of that amendment, the States surrendered their rights to protect the life of persons without their jurisdiction, and to punish the persons who may put any one of them to death, then the States are without power "to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society." And the constitutional guaranty by the United States "to every State in this Union a republican form of government" was annulled by the amendment. That such was not the intention of Congress when it proposed and submitted the fourteenth amendment is clearly shown by its refusal and rejection, during the consideration of the amendment, this proffered clause: "Congress shall have the power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property." Had that clause been adopted and ratified by the States instead of the one that was adopted, containing the prohibition that "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of the laws," Congress would have had the power to enact affirmative legislation, original power to make laws touching all rights pertaining to immunities, privileges, life, liberty, or property, to establish a code of municipal laws regulative of all private rights between man and man. But instead of stripping the States of their power or the rights pertaining to the life, liberty, or property of the individual, the clause containing the prohibition quoted above was adopted and ordained, the effect of which was to grant to Congress only the right of "vetoing, correcting, restraining, and nullifying laws and State action denying the rights" guaranteed by the amendment. Had that proffered clause been adopted, the Supreme Court of the United States would not have declared unconstitutional, as it did, the act of Congress punishing as a criminal offense the act of two or more persons—who conspire or go in disguise upon the highway or on the premises of another for the purpose of depriving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the law or of equal privileges or immunities under the law; or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving or securing to all persons within such State or Territory the equal protection of the laws.

It would not have said in its opinion condemning that statute as being unconstitutional that the equal protection clause in the fourteenth amendment—does not add anything to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guaranty of any encroachment by the States of the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society. The duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States, and it remains there. The obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, and no more. The power of the National Government is limited to this guaranty.

Nor would the court have said in Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313), and repeated in United States v. Harris (106 U. S., 629)—

these provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State actions exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals.

Nor would the court have said in the Cruikshank case:

The very highest duty of the States, when they entered into the Union under the Constitution, was to protect all persons within their boundaries in the enjoyment of those inalienable rights with which they were endowed by their Creator. Sovereignty for this purpose rests alone with the States. It is no more the duty, or within the power of the United States, to punish for a conspiracy to falsely imprison or murder within a State than it would be to punish for false imprisonment or murder itself. The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, but this adds nothing to the rights of one citizen as against another. It simply furnishes an additional guaranty of any encroachment by the States upon the fundamental rights which belong to every citizen as a member of society.

The court was there speaking with reference to the act of Congress which made it a felony for two or more persons to band or conspire together, or go in disguise upon the highway or upon the premises of another, to violate any provision of that act, or to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen, with intent to prevent his free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States or because of his having exercised the same.

Nor would the court have held in the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S.-P., 3) that the act of Congress making it a criminal offense for any person to deny the full and equal enjoyment of the accommodations, advantages, facilities, and privileges of inns, public conveyances on land or water, theaters, and other places of public amusement to citizens of every race and color, regardless of any previous condition of servitude, was unconstitutional. Had the court conceived that the fourteenth amendment conferred upon Congress the jurisdiction to enact direct, affirmative police regulations, excluding the rights of the State in adopting and ratifying the fourteenth amendment, it would not have held that—

The fourteenth amendment is prohibitory upon the States only, and the legislation authorized to be adopted by Congress for enforcing it is not direct legislation on the matters respecting which the States are prohibited from making or enforcing certain laws or doing certain acts, but is corrective legislation, such as may be necessary or proper for counteracting and redressing the effect of such laws or acts.

Nor would the court have used this language in that opinion:

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the law.

Speaking of the fifth section of the amendment, which gives Congress the power to enforce it, the court says:

To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition. To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts, and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with the power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide modes of relief against State legislation or State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment. Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the fourteenth amendment; but they are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings, affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect; and such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect.

The court further said:

Until some State law has been passed or some State action, through its officers or agents, has been taken adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity; for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation may and should be provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against; and that is, State laws or State action of some kind adverse to the rights of citizens secured by the amendment. Such legislation can not properly cover the whole domain of rights appertaining to life, liberty, and property, defining them and providing for their vindication. That would be to establish a code of municipal law regulative of all private rights between man and man in society. It would be to make Congress take the place of State legislatures and to supersede them. It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property, which include all civil rights that men have, are, by the amendment, sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that, because the denial by the State to any person of the equal protection of the law is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but is corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the State may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking.

Speaking further to the power of Congress to legislate on the subject of the violation by private persons of rights secured by the amendment, the court says:

Civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, can not be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals, unsupported by State authority, in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the State for redress. An individual can not deprive a man of his right to vote, to hold property, to buy and to sell, to sue in the courts, or to be a witness or a juror; he may, by force or fraud, interfere with the enjoyment of the right in a particular case; he may commit an assault upon the person, or commit murder, or use ruffian violence at the polls, or slander the good name of a citizen; but, unless protected in the wrongful acts by some shield of State law or State authority, he can not destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment, and amenable therefor to the laws of the State where the wrongful act was committed. Hence, in all those cases where the Constitution seeks to protect the rights of the citizen against discriminative and unjust laws of the State by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offenses, but abrogation and denial of rights, which is denounced, and for which it clothes the Congress with power to provide a remedy. This abrogation and denial of right for which the States alone could be responsible was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied. And the remedy to be provided must necessarily be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that in the cases provided for the evil or wrong actually committed rests upon some State law or State authority for its excuse or perpetration.

Speaking to the legislative act which the court had under consideration, the court further said:

The law in question, without any reference to adverse State legislation on the subject, declares that all persons shall be entitled to equal accommodations and privileges of inns, public conveyances, and places of public amusement, and imposes a penalty upon any individual who shall deny to any citizen such equal accommodations and privileges. This is not corrective legislation; it is primary and direct; it takes immediate and absolute possession of the subject of the right of admission to inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement. It supersedes and displaces State legislation on the same subject, or only allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national legislation. Whether it would not have been a more effective protection of the rights of citizens to have clothed Congress with plenary power over the whole subject is not now the question. What we have to decide is whether such plenary power has been conferred upon Congress by the fourteenth amendment; and, in our judgment, it has not.

In order to emphasize that the fourteenth amendment confers no power upon the Congress to legislate on the subject of the violations by private persons of the rights, either civil or criminal, secured to those persons whose rights are violated and to which they have an unqualified right of enjoyment, I quote again from Harris's case (106 U. S., 644):

A private person can not make constitutions or laws, nor can he, with authority, construe them, nor can he administer or execute them. The only way therefore in which one private person can deprive another of the equal protection of the laws is by the commission of some offense against the laws which protect the rights of persons, as by theft, burglary, arson, libel, assault, or murder.

The principles declared in the cases quoted from establish beyond all controversy that the provision of the bill under discussion condemning individuals for the acts mentioned in the third paragraph of the bill and those of the fourth paragraph, fixing the punishment for those acts, are beyond the delegated power granted to Congress by the fourteenth amendment and are therefore unconstitutional.

CONGRESS IS WITHOUT POWER TO PENALIZE COUNTIES.

I shall next discuss the legislative power of Congress to penalize counties.

Counties are creatures of State legislation and possess no powers other than those conferred by the State. They can neither sue nor be sued unless the right is conferred by State legislation; and where the right to be sued is conferred, that right is limited to those cases ordained by the State legislation defining the causes of action on which they shall be liable. At common law counties were never liable for the torts of its officers committed outside of the scope of their authority. The relation of principal and agent does not exist between counties and their officers and therefore the maxim respondeat superior has never had any application. The assumption by the bill to penalize counties necessarily carries with it the implied power that Congress may supersede the sovereign power of the State and impose a liability upon counties, where none exists, either at common law or under State legislation. It even goes further than this. It carries with it the power of Congress to create counties and to prescribe, notwithstanding State legislation to the contrary, their liabilities for all causes of action which Congress may originate. This is bound to be true, otherwise the liability imposed by the bill upon counties could be defeated by State legislation and the provision of the bill penalizing them, rendered abortive and ineffective. It would be a non sequitur to say that Congress has the power to fix a liability but is without power to create the status against which that liability may be enforced.

Indeed it would be an absurdity to say that Congress may fix a liability upon a county but is impotent to create the right of suability to enforce that liability and to make a county respond to the liability created, though the law of its creation may provide otherwise. If Congress has the power to create counties which are no more than political subdivisions of States, it would have the power to create county officers, prescribe their qualifications, duties, and liabilities. Furthermore it would have the right to exercise the powers of State sovereignty and to supersede the exercise of those powers by the State. It would have the power to reduce the States to mere Provinces, to destroy their autonomy, and to deprive them of all sovereign power.

IT IS STATE ACTION AND NOT NONACTION THAT IS PROHIBITED BY THE AMENDMENT.

I shall next discuss the power of Congress to exercise authority over "State or municipal officers charged with the duty to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage" by their "failure, neglect, or refusal to make all reasonable effort to protect such person from death," notwithstanding State laws may punish such officers for such failure, neglect, or refusal, and notwithstanding their acts may be in violation of the laws of the State or its political governmental subdivision.

I have the honor to represent, in part, a State whose constitution creates the office of sheriff and makes him one of the executive officers of the State, charged with the duty of enforcing its laws and containing the provision that—

Whenever any prisoner is taken from jail or from the custody of any sheriff or his deputy and put to death or suffers grievous bodily harm, owing to the neglect, connivance, cowardice, or other grave fault of the sheriff, such sheriff shall be impeached—and thereupon convicted, he shall not be eligible to hold office in this State during the time for which he had been elected or appointed to serve as sheriff.

Is it possible that under the prohibitive grant of the fourteenth amendment Congress has the power to supersede and nullify that constitutional provision? If it has, then it has the constitutional authority to compel State officers to perform their duties, and if it has that authority, it has the power to prescribe those duties, and in the exercise of that power it is unfettered and unlimited by State legislation, and when exercised the States are powerless to prescribe the duties of their officers and to punish them for a failure to perform those duties. The authority for the exercise of such power by the Congress appears to be predicated upon the language used by Mr. Justice Strong in the case of Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 340). That language is this:

A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision—fourteenth amendment—therefore must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or evade it.

The quotation is far from supporting the contention that a State acts when one of its executive officers "fails, neglects, or refuses" to discharge the duties imposed upon him by the laws of his State or does an act in violation of its laws. By no process of reasoning can it be said of an executive officer who does not act at all that his failure to act is an act "in the name or for the State." That that great court understood that the language employed and quoted meant that to bind the State by an act of its executive officer the act must be "in the name and for the State," in pursuance of the laws of the State and not in violation of them, is clearly shown by the language employed in the Civil Rights cases, where it is said:

The prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority.

And, further, in speaking of the wrongful acts of an individual, unsupported by State authority, the court denounces such acts as being—simply a private wrong or crime of that individual—

And which—

if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force.

Speaking further of the attempted deprivation of the rights of a citizen by the act of an individual, the court said:

Unless protected in the wrongful act by some State law or State authority, he can not destroy or injure the right; he will only render himself amenable to satisfaction or punishment; and amenable therefor to the laws of the State where the wrongful acts are committed.

In Barney v. the City of New York (193 U. S., 431) proceedings were instituted to enjoin the city of New York, the board of rapid transit commissioners, a State agency, and certain individuals, not officially connected with the city or the State, from doing certain acts in violation of the laws of the State of New York. The proceedings were not against the officers of the city or the members composing the board of commissioners. In other words, the complainant sought to bind the city and the board by the unlawful acts of city officers who were not made parties to his bill, on the theory that the city and the board of commissioners were bound by their unauthorized and illegal acts to the alleged injury of the complainant. The trial court dismissed the bill. On appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States the opinion was by Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, concurred in by all the members of the court, and after quoting the extract from the opinion of Ex parte Virginia, which I have heretofore set out, and showing the holdings of that court in other cases, he says:

In the present case defendants were proceeding not only in violation of provisions of the State law but in opposition to plain prohibitions.

The decree of the lower court was affirmed.

In the great case of Ex parte Young (209 U. S., 123) the court had under consideration the original application for leave to file a petition for writs of habeas corpus and certiorari in behalf of Young, petitioner, as attorney general of the State of Minnesota. Young had been fined for contempt of the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Minnesota. He, in justification of his refusal to obey the order of that court, entered in a certain cause, not necessary here to mention, disclaimed any intention to treat the court with disrespect, but believing that the decision of the United States court in the action, holding that it had jurisdiction to enjoin him, as attorney general, from performing his discretionary official duties, was in conflict with the eleventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States, he believed it to be his duty, as such attorney general, to do the acts for which he was adjudged to be in contempt. In other words, Young set up the fact that he was acting for the State of Minnesota as one of its executive officers and that the proceeding in which he was enjoined as attorney general was a proceeding against the State of Minnesota. The court, after reviewing many cases brought against State officers to prevent the commission of wrongs by them in the attempted enforcement of unconstitutional State statutes, said:

The act to be enforced is alleged to be unconstitutional, and if it be so, the use of the name of the State to enforce an unconstitutional act to the injury of complainants is a proceeding without the authority of and one which does not affect the State in its sovereign or governmental capacity. It is simply an illegal act upon the part of a State official in attempting by the use of the name of the State to enforce a legislative enactment which is void because unconstitutional. If the act which the State attorney general seeks to enforce be a violation of the Federal Constitution, the officer in proceeding under such enactment comes in conflict with the superior authority of that Constitution, and he is, in that case, stripped of his official or representative character and is subjected in his person to the consequences of his individual conduct.

And this is bound to be true, otherwise individuals wronged by executive State officers acting in the name of the State, without authority of law, would be without remedy to enforce in the courts the injuries inflicted by such wrongs. If the acts of such officers were the acts of the State and the State bound by those acts, then the injured party would have no recourse, for the reason that the eleventh amendment of the Constitution of the United States prohibits the exercise of the judicial power of the United States over—any suit in law or equity, commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State—and for the further reason that the citizen of a State never had the right to institute and maintain a suit against his own State without its consent.

The cases are too numerous to here enumerate, in which the Supreme Court of the United States has recognized and enforced the rights of the citizen against State executive officers, who, under the use of the name of the State, were attempting to inflict injury to those rights.

After a most diligent search and careful examination of the decisions of that court I have been unable to find any case, when properly analyzed, opposed to the principles announced in the cases cited and quoted from, except some expressions which are obiter dictum, in the case of Home Telegraph & Telephone Co. v. Los Angeles (227 U. S., 278). That was a suit instituted by a bill filed in the United States district court of California seeking injunctive relief against the city of Los Angeles and certain of its officers to prevent the enforcement of an ordinance adopted by the city establishing telephone rates, which were alleged to be so unreasonable that their enforcement would bring about the confiscation of the property of the complainant. The trial court refused to grant the preliminary injunction, entertaining the opinion that no jurisdiction was disclosed by the bill, and on the filing of a formal plea to the jurisdiction of the court, dismissed it. The plea alleged that the suit did not really or substantially involve a dispute or controversy properly within the jurisdiction of the court, as the constitution of the State of California provided that—no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law—and that complainant, though a resident of California, had never invoked the jurisdiction of the State court to enforce that constitutional provision. It will be noted that no question was raised as to the suability of the city or as to whether the suit should have been brought against the executive officers of the city to prevent their enforcement of an unconstitutional law, acting in the name of the city or the State. The only question presented by the plea, which was sustained by the trial court, was whether the fact that the constitution of California guaranteeing due process of law, as does the fourteenth amendment, deprived the United States court of jurisdiction. In the determination of that question it was wholly unnecessary to express an opinion upon the question as to whether the acts of State officers, acting in the name of the State, in attempting to enforce an unconstitutional law, represented the State in its sovereign or governmental capacity. Indeed, the question as to whether the acts of the executive city officers of Los Angeles, acting in the name of that city, represented the city in its governmental capacity, was not raised.

It is therefore clear that the language used in the opinion with respect to those questions, if opposed to what was said in Ex parte Young and in Barney's case, quoted above, was dictum pure and simple. Besides, the criticism indulged in of the opinion in the Barney case was wholly unwarranted, in addition to being dictum. In the Barney case the city of New York and the board of commissioners, a State agency, were proceeding in defiance of State laws, while in this case the city of Los Angeles and its officials were acting under an ordinance of the city ordained pursuant to and under the authority of State laws and not in violation of them. This clearly distinguishes the two cases, and there is in reality no conflict between them.

Furthermore, the acts complained of were affirmative, positive acts, and not a mere failure, neglect, or refusal to act.

Moreover, the opinion really and in fact placed the decision of the court that the jurisdiction of the trial court could be maintained by the application of—the established principle that the exercise of municipal legislative authority, under the sanction of the State law, is the exertion of State legislative power within the purview of the contract clause of the Constitution (Art. I, sec. 10) declaring, "No State * * * shall pass any * * * law impairing the obligation of contracts."

It is therefore manifest that the opinion in that case does not commit the court to the announcement of principles so utterly at variance with those declared in the Civil Rights cases and in others, firmly establishing the principle that the fourteenth amendment does not confer upon the Congress the primary power to enact direct, affirmative, general legislation regulative of the private rights between man and man, which rests alone with the States in the exercise of their sovereignty and exclusively within the domain of State legislation, to supersede State legislation by taking the place of State legislatures, as is attempted by this bill. Nor can the opinion possibly be construed as committing that court to the interdiction of that well-established principle of law, fully recognized by that court, that neither a State nor any of its political governmental subdivisions through which it functions is liable for torts committed by public officers.

This exemption is based upon the sovereign character of the State and its agencies and upon the absence of obligations and not upon the ground that no means for a remedy has been provided. The Government—does not undertake to guarantee to any person the fidelity of the officers or agents whom it employs, since that would involve it in all its operations in endless embarrassment, difficulties, and losses which would be subversive of the public interests.

To commit the court to holding in the Los Angeles case that a State or any of its political governmental subdivisions is bound by the unauthorized or illegal acts of its officers would be to commit that court to the holding that a State or its political subdivision would be liable for the injuries so inflicted and that liability enforced by the courts if the State was suable.

CONGRESS IS WITHOUT POWER TO PRESCRIBE THE LIMITS OF THE OPERATION OF THE AMENDMENT.

I have been wondering ever since I read this bill if its authors, in constructing it, entertained the notion that the Congress possesses the power to either narrow or enlarge the limits of the fourteenth amendment or if it has the power to prescribe the orbit within which that amendment may be operative. It would appear that some such view was entertained by the attempt found in the second paragraph of the bill to extend the guaranty of the equal-protection clause of the amendment to the "failure, neglect, or refusal" of the State or its governmental subdivisions "to provide and maintain" protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage composed of five persons or more, and impliedly refusing such protection to the life of a person against a mob or riotous assemblage composed of four, three, or two persons.

Do the authors think the lynching of a person is less criminal, less heinous, and less revolting and intolerable when done by four, three, or two persons, or for that matter by one, than when done by five? If not, then why not extend the guaranty of protection to life against all unjustifiable violence resulting in death? Certainly the number who engage in the unlawful act, or the instrumentalities employed, can not make the crime less criminal or less injurious to the rights of the murdered man or woman, or reduce those rights to a degree by which he or she is afforded no protection under the amendment.

The attempt to classify mob violence resulting in death so as to bring it within the operation of the protection afforded by the amendment is a bald usurpation of power and can no more be exercised than can the power to punish murder or other common law crimes. There is just as much reason in support of such a classification as there would be in support of a classification predicated upon the character of weapons used in depriving the murdered person of his life. It would be just as logical, and quite as righteous, to extend the protection of the guaranty to the life of the man or woman whose life is taken by the use of a rifle and to deny the protection to one whose death was produced by the use of a knife, pistol, or ax.

And the attempt to extend by legislation the equal-protection clause of the amendment to the nonaction of a State or governmental subdivision in the enforcement of laws punishing murder, by whomsoever and under whatsoever circumstances committed, is as equally a culpable usurpation of constitutional power.

It is State action and not nonaction that is prohibited by the amendment, and it is only State action of a peculiar character over which the Congress has the power of control by legislation.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OPINION THAT BILL IS CONSTITUTIONAL ERRONEOUS.

It is indeed regrettable that the honorable Attorney General, before expressing his opinion to the Committee of the Judiciary of the House, and permitting his opinion and that of his assistant to be made a part of the report of that committee on this bill, did not give a more thorough consideration of its constitutionality. Had they examined the opinions of the Supreme Court of the United States more carefully they would not have made the mistake of predicating their opinion that the bill is constitutional upon cases dealing with legislative acts prescribing police regulations for the enforcement of affirmative grants of power by the States to the National Government, and applying the principles announced by the court in those cases in support of the constitutionality of this bill. They would not have cited and quoted from the case of Hoke v. United States (237 U. S., 309), as sustaining the constitutionality of this bill, where the question presented was the power of Congress to enact what is known as the "white slave traffic act," passed in pursuance of and incidental to the power conferred to regulate interstate commerce, had they observed the distinction between the principles applicable to an affirmative exclusive grant of constitutional power and the principles applicable to the exercise of a negative or prohibitive power.

Had they given that consideration to the grave questions presented by the bill to which they are entitled they could scarcely have failed to see that the power granted by the fourteenth amendment of the equal protection of the laws is prohibitory and confers upon the Congress merely the power of "vetoing, correcting, restraining, and nullifying bad laws and action of the States denying the rights" guaranteed.

It would be extremely unfortunate for Congress, during the period when the National Government is expending millions of dollars to enforce the laws of the country and its executive officers are strenuously engaged in the suppression of lawlessness, to itself commit, if possible, a greater crime by refusing to enforce the Constitution, which its Members solemnly swore to support.

Woe to the political future of any Representative of the people in this House who indicates by his vote for this bill his willingness to disregard section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution:

> The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government—> make Congress take the place of State legislatures and to supersede them.

Let us understand and appreciate that the Constitution is, to us, no "covenant with death," no "agreement with hell," but the supreme law of the land, and is entitled to our most loyal support.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for one minute.

LEGISLATION SHOULD BE CONSTITUTIONAL AND EFFECTIVE.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when a man comes from a district which contains a host of good people, of the very best, who think that the United States can do everything; when it contains, as is the case in my own district, much more than the ordinary majority of colored people, who think that the United States can protect them everywhere and administer justice in every State, it is a solemn duty—and I have sworn to perform my duty under the Constitution and to support that Constitution—to remember that Abraham Lincoln said:

> No man who has sworn to support the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it.

[Applause.]

Abraham Lincoln was in many respects a practical politician as well as a statesman. He knew how to watch and to wait. He knew how to act under the Constitution when he thought action would be effective, and to wait until it should be so. But Abraham Lincoln was not one of those politicians who believed in the devilish motto that you may do evil that good may come. [Applause.] And I owe it to my people and to the people of the United States that, in the face of this awful prevalence of crime, whether murder or lynching or rape, or whatever it may be, I shall not try to give to the people a stone instead of bread, green goods instead of a real bill that is worth something. [Applause.]

THIS BILL IS NEITHER.

I shall have something to say to gentlemen on the other side if I have time, but I fear that this bill, where it is not unconstitutional, is absolutely ineffective. I do not remember the exact words of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] in speaking about punishing the officer, but in effect he said it was practically a sham in that particular. He did not use that word.

THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

The Constitution, in the fourteenth amendment, says:

> No State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

I emphasize certain words: "State" means a State. "Deny" means an affirmative act, or one that can be inferred from a course of conduct. "The equal protection of the laws" refers to the equality of all persons before the law.

IT DOES NOT COVER INDIVIDUALS.

No provision of the Constitution has been subject to more construction by the courts. I shall not cite phrases. It is more important to know exactly what was done; it is better understood.

In the Slaughterhouse cases the Supreme Court determined that the amendment was not intended to apply to individuals or to take away the local self-government of the States, but that it was a prohibition against the States doing certain things—not an interference with their government.

In the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 37) it was held that although Pullman cars and railroads and inns and public amusements were public in their nature and filled a public want, they were carried on by individuals, and that those individuals could discriminate by their regulations between different people substantially as they pleased, so long as they afforded them the proper attention.

NOR LYNCHERS.

Then came the Harris case (106 U. S., 629), one of lynching. From the indictment it appears that three or four people were badly beaten by a mob and one Wells was killed, and the indictment was under an act which provided a penalty for conspiracy to deprive a man of his equal rights and the equal protection of the laws by going on the highways. It was a statute against a mob and people forming a mob. The Supreme Court of the United States in that case held that this could not be punished by the United States; that it was a crime against the State, and must be punished by them.

Years afterwards, in 1904, Powell and Riggins were indicted in Alabama for joining in a lynching, and Judge Jones, of Alabama, was of the opinion, as argued here, that the fourteenth amendment had been extended and that it could be used to punish the members of that mob. (134 F. R., 409.) Riggins was convicted. Powell went to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court, having just decided the Hodges case (203 U. S., 1), which was a conspiracy to keep people from having the right to go to work, wherein they had affirmed the old doctrine, immediately repeated it in the Powell case, and said that lynchers could not be held by the United States under the fourteenth amendment (212 U. S., 564), and thereupon not only Powell but Riggins was released. Powell had already been discharged by Judge Jones under the Hodges case above mentioned (151 F. R.). The Government appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States. They alone were heard. The other side did not appear, and the Government was turned down and the indictment held bad.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know how to find a stronger line of decisions settling the law, that this bill is absolutely unconstitutional and a sham and a gold brick, so far as indictment of the lynchers is concerned; and we can not vote for the bill on that part of it.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I can not yield unless I can get more time; I have only one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

IT WOULD BE INEFFECTIVE AS TO THE SHERIFF.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The case as to an officer is different. My contention, if I have time to make my contention, is that no matter what statute is passed upon that subject, it would be ineffective, because no jury, Federal or otherwise, will indict or convict a sheriff who has had a gun put at his head and is simply a weakling. They will not hold that he is a criminal because he is a coward. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I would like to have some more time.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am sorry I have not any more time.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Will the chairman of the committee afford me more time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I regret I can not.

Under the leave to extend his remarks, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey submits the following:

THE AMENDMENT BINDS THE STATE AND ALL ITS OFFICERS.

The fourteenth amendment is no sham.

It made unconstitutional a host of State laws, and hundreds of pages in the Digest deal with the cases under that amendment.

It has made void hosts of laws and municipal regulations which discriminated against persons as to their life, property, or privileges.

It applies to every State agency, legislative, executive, judicial, or municipal.

Where a judge in Virginia had the power to select the juries and refused to select any colored men on those juries, his persistent denial of their right to jury duty was held a crime under a United States statute forbidding such denial.

He was convicted and the conviction was affirmed in the Supreme Court. (Ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S., 339.)

Where a California municipal officer had the right to license laundries and refused to license any Chinaman, and Yick Wo was convicted for keeping a laundry without a license, the Supreme Court held that conviction void. (Yick Wo v. Sheriff, 118 U. S., 356.)

ACTING IN THEIR JURISDICTION.

These were cases in which the State officer, within his authority under the State law, denied the equal protection of that law.

The officer was acting fully within his authority and committed no crime against the State, and his action therefore was the action of the State, and treated as such under the fourteenth amendment.

On the other hand, where the officer breaks the State law and criminally violates his duty under that law, his action may be held not to be the action of the State, but his individual action. (Barney v. N. Y., 193 U. S. 430.) The case cites other distinguishing acts done ex virtute officii from those ex colore officii—those done by virtue of the office from those under color of office.

NOT PERHAPS WHEN THE OFFICER GOES OUTSIDE OF HIS DUTY.

The sheriff may be held responsible to the State and not to the United States.

This bill fails to recognize this distinction.

It attempts to make it an act of the State for the sheriff to violate his oath of office, break the State law, and to fail to exercise reasonable care of his prisoner, although in such case his action is not the action of the State but is an express violation of official duty. Perhaps it may be held by the Supreme Court that this action is not that of the State and not covered by the fourteenth amendment.

It is to be noted also that the fourteenth amendment does not refer to carelessness, but to the affirmative act of denial such as was shown by the judge in Virginia and the license officer in California.

The fourteenth amendment does not refer to all acts which take away the protection of the laws but a denial of equal protection; that is to say, discrimination.

A CONSTITUTIONAL ACT.

In my judgment an act would be constitutional which provided as follows:

"If any State, through any of its officers or agents, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws, such officer or agent shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

This is in the words of the Constitution and as broad. It would leave to the court under the facts of each case to determine whether the act was an official act and that of the State or an individual act that was not that of the State.

The distinction in each particular case would be absolutely clear.

BUT NOT EFFECTIVE.

But even if this part of this bill should be held constitutional, it would be ineffective and injurious.

At present governors who respect the law remove a sheriff instantly who proves himself a weakling in the presence of a mob.

That sheriff is only a weakling and may not be a criminal when he has not the energy and courage to stand up against a gun, but he is not the best man to be sheriff.

But he is less likely to be removed if such removal would prejudice a trial in the United States court.

The practical thing, however, is that no jury is likely to indict or convict a man as a felon because he had not the courage to face a mob.

This would be especially true where the prosecution is not by the sentiment of the neighborhood, but under an outside statute overthrowing the laws of the State. This provision would be worthless in practice.

THE UNITED STATES CAN NOT PENALIZE THE COUNTY.

The only other section of this bill gives to the next of kin of the person who is killed by a mob a right to recover $10,000 from every county in which he was seized or taken by that mob.

It makes the locality guarantee the absolute execution of the laws.

The State may make the locality responsible because the State created that locality and controls it. The United States has no such power.

The criminal acts of an individual or a mob are not acts of a State for which it or its counties can be held responsible under the fourteenth amendment.

THE AWFUL GROWTH OF CRIMES OF VIOLENCE.

It is an awful fact that the United States has more crimes of violence than most civilized countries.

Abraham Lincoln's first essay on political matters was directed against lynching, then prevalent in Illinois.

Murders in the last few years have increased frightfully.

Robberies have extended to the mails and all our large cities.

The automobile has taken the place of the horse, and good roads have made escape easy.

Perhaps the greatest growth in these crimes has been in the very matter in which the United States has attempted to take charge—in bootlegging, liquor stealing, and a host of crimes that we never knew before.

Thousands of cases under the prohibition amendment already fill our courts and have choked the administration of justice and the voice of the law.

Harm can come out of this legislation.

The race issue is an awful thing. It is almost as awful to tell any community that they can rely on justice being done elsewhere and need not maintain order.

THE HISTORY OF LYNCHING.

It has not been suggested that lynching has grown in the United States with its population.

It has diminished as fast as civil government has become settled.

It was once the universal punishment for the horse thief who was found with the goods, when there were no sheriffs and no courts near by.

It has been common when some bad man has killed the sheriff and has been chased as an outlaw.

It is now too common when an outrageous crime has been committed and when suspicion has fallen, however unjustly, on a particular man.

Lynching comes largely because there is distrust of the courts and of jury trial.

Many States have degraded the jury and the courts, so that it is often impossible to secure an intelligent jury, because no one can be sworn who has read the newspapers and formed an opinion.

The judge is sometimes forbidden to charge the jury on the admitted facts and to tell them what they really have to decide.

Successive appeals are provided which delay the execution of the sentence, and the most technical objections are allowed to upset the verdict of a jury before whom the case has been thrown in an undigested mass.

As a result in such communities the law is not thoroughly respected as sufficient for the punishment of outrageous crime. For enforcement of the law it is a sad fact that in many parts of the United States they need to return to a real trial by court and jury where the court has power to state the evidence and advise the jury what is the real issue of fact and upon what principles of law their verdict should be based, and to the limitation of appeals, so that the sentence and its execution shall follow promptly upon the verdict without captious appeals or frivolous delays.

IT DEMORALIZES THE COMMUNITY.

The most awful part of lynching is its effect upon the community. It trains men as murderers.

That community is taught to despise the law and to seek private vengeance, which often hits the wrong man. It is abominable in every way.

I once knew a case. A desperado shot the sheriff's deputy; the alarm went through the countryside and the town was soon filled with horsemen coming in with their rifles. Almost all the colored people in the town ran away for fear. The mob broke open the jail, killed a poor colored prisoner who had nothing to do with the riot, and then rounded up the town, making the colored boys dance by shooting entirely too near their legs. A company of soldiers came promptly and restored order, while a posse chased the outlaw to the swamps and he was killed fighting.

THE LOCALITY MUST CURE IT.

There is nothing so bad as the blind and heartless cruelty of a mob. It was that cruelty which shocked the world in the French Revolution, when the cry was raised, "To the lamp post." But France had to be left to work out her own salvation, as every community must be left to make and carry out the law and punish crimes.

Ireland has proved that this can not be done by courts run from outside of the community. In the last few months houses were burned and men and women killed in spite of 100,000 soldiers.

Dr. Francis Lieber used to say that liberty depended upon local self-government and not upon a republican form of government; that France had a republican form of government, but that every mayor was appointed from Paris.

We have tried government from Washington in the Indian Territory. It was not good.

I once saw the dead body of an Indian marshal there on the road who had been shot down by bootleggers whom he had tried to arrest.

Law and order can come only from the sentiment of the community, which will educate itself and will develop law and order if the unit of that community is small enough and is given power to take care of itself.

The right of trial in the county by a jury of his peers is the foundation of English liberty and of the American liberty which has proceeded from it. We should not trust anything else, and perhaps rather see disorder than czarism or bolshevism.

The Constitution of the United States recognizes our form of government—an indestructible union of indestructible States. We have sworn to uphold the Constitution. I should be glad if every voter was sworn to uphold the Constitution.

THE TENDENCY TO CENTRALIZATION.

Some few of us have tried to be consistent in our opposition to the tendency which exists here to centralize our Government and get away from the old-fashioned local self-government of city, town, and county and trial by jury, and have opposed government by a central police by whatever name called.

The House and country are to be congratulated on the constitutional arguments which have been now made on this bill. We could wish that the men who made those arguments had been more consistent, and that they could have joined us in opposing the invasions lately made by the United States of the reserve powers of the States.

Those invasions have been manifold. United States statutes have established United States control of common roads, United States police in agriculture, United States responsibility for damage done by floods, even by rivers entirely within the State, United States health and quarantine bureaus in all States, and it is proposed to regulate birth by United States institutions.

Many of the gentlemen who now so earnestly support and applaud local State government were among those who voted to invade the State's control of its own suffrage. Others voted for an amendment to give the United States concurrent—really dominant—police power over the manufacture and sale of liquor, establishing a double jurisdiction in the courts under State or United States laws with reference to all the details of that difficult subject.

This last invasion has been made constitutional by the eighteenth amendment, but its results are already evident in contempt for law here, there, and everywhere.

CONCLUSIONS.

It is not right for anyone who believes in an indestructible Union of indestructible States to take the first step in putting jurisdiction in the United States over all crimes against persons and property on the ground that such crimes deny to the persons injured the protection of the law, or that the States deny protection because they can not always give it.

It would not be right to do so if the Constitution permitted such legislation.

It is still more wrong when the Constitution does not permit.

We should not present the people with an unconstitutional bill which will be held void or which will prove ineffectual.

Let us legislate according to the Constitution.

Let us trust the people of each State. They are good people everywhere and are fit to govern themselves, and should be allowed to do so, subject to the restriction that the State shall not deny to any person the equal protection of the law.

They must be trusted to punish any individual, whether in or out of office, who violates his duty to his State and injures anyone else.

Gentlemen say we should pass this law, even if we believe it unconstitutional, because its effect will be good. I stand with Abraham Lincoln. I stand with him, the friend of the colored man, the friend of man, and the lover of the Constitution.

The passage of this bill will do no good. It may only raise again the race issue, and the result of raising that issue has always been disastrous to the honest, law-abiding colored people of the South.

Justice will never be had unless undivided responsibility is put somewhere.

That responsibility is now and remains with the States. We must hold them to it.

It is absolute folly to relieve them in any way of that responsibility.

Such a folly would be a legislative crime.

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM AND PRESIDENT HARDING.

This course was not recommended by the Republican platform, which only asked the Congress to take the matter into consideration.

> We urge Congress to consider the most effective means to end lynching in this country, which continues to be a terrible blot on American civilization.

It was not recommended by President Harding, who asked that a commission be appointed to investigate the matter, composed of representatives of both races. In his speech of April 12 he said:

> Somewhat related to the foregoing human problems is the race question. Congress ought to wipe the stain of barbaric lynching from the banners of a free and orderly, representative democracy. We face the fact that many millions of people of African descent are numbered among our population, and that in a number of States they constitute a very large proportion of the total population. It is unnecessary to recount the difficulties incident to this condition, nor to emphasize the fact that it is a condition which can not be removed. There has been suggestion, however, that some of the difficulties might be ameliorated by a humane and enlightened consideration of it, a study of its many aspects, and an effort to formulate, if not a policy, at least a national attitude of mind calculated to bring about the most satisfactory possible adjustment of relations between the races, and of each race to the national life. One proposal is the creation of a commission embracing representatives of both races, to study and report on the entire subject. The proposal has real merit. I am convinced that in mutual tolerance, understanding, charity, recognition of the interdependence of the races, and the maintenance of the rights of citizenship lies the road to righteous adjustment.

Publicity of the real facts will bring the remedy in the States. The United States can only muddle if it try to meddle.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, how much time was used by the gentleman from Mississippi?

The CHAIRMAN. Three minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I beg your pardon, Mr. Chairman. You have a mighty fast clock there. I was keeping time on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed by the time clerk that the gentleman used three minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GILBERT].

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it seems to be conceded by the great majority of those who have given this question study that this bill is unconstitutional in many of its provisions. I go further than that, and say that in my humble opinion this bill is unconstitutional in its entirety. It is subversive of the very principles upon which our Government is founded. But aside from that, even if it were constitutional, it is in some of its provisions vicious and indefensible.

I was unable to get time to address the committee, so I ask indulgence of the committee for unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. SANDLIN].

Mr. SANDLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, one coming from the section of the country from which I come and realizing the evil effects and the great injustice of the legislation proposed by this bill finds it difficult to discuss it dispassionately. However strenuously the proponents of this measure may deny that this bill was introduced in response to the demands of a certain class of political agitators, remembering the witnesses who appeared before the committee in advocacy of this measure and the press reports with reference to it and the arguments made in support of it on the floor of this House, we are convinced this measure is a political one, pure and simple.

In my humble opinion it is unfortunate at this time in our Nation's history, when there are so many questions, both national and international, disturbing the people, such as railroad rates, demoralized condition of the farming industry, the unemployment situation, lack of foreign trade, and innumerable others, all pressing for solution and upon which the people are demanding that immediate action shall be taken by this Congress, with a view to early solution and relief, that this uncalled for, unconstitutional, vicious, and ineffectual legislation should be considered.

The constitutional phase of this bill has been so ably and thoroughly covered by the Member from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] and others that it would seem to be unnecessary to dwell on this point. I am sure that no lawyer in this body would be willing to stake his reputation as an authority by asserting that this proposed measure is constitutional.

The title of the bill now under consideration reads as follows:

To assure to persons within the jurisdiction of any State the equal protection of the law and to punish the crime of lynching.

The title is misleading. Properly the title should read thus: "A bill to provide accident insurance on the lives of persons who have committed or are about to commit a crime, payable to the family of the criminal."

In this proposed legislation a mob or riotous assemblage is defined as an assemblage of five or more persons who put to death a person who has committed or is about to commit some crime against society. Hence, according to the terms of this bill, four persons or a less number, acting in concert and doing the selfsame act, would be held guiltless. This provision, to say the least, is ridiculous and can not appeal to the judgment of any fair-minded legislator.

I would call to your attention and earnest consideration the sections of the bill that would penalize the county or parish in which a person is put to death at the hands of a mob or riotous assemblage in the sum of $10,000, and which goes further and would penalize a county or parish through which the victim of a mob might be transported.

If legislation of this kind is constitutional, there can be and will be no limits to which the Congress can go with kindred measures of this kind. We will be called upon, and can not consistently refuse, to pass legislation controlling and directing the officials of the States in the enforcement of all their criminal laws.

No one is deceived by the arguments of the proponents of this bill that it is not initiated and pressed for political purposes, nor directed at any particular section of this country, for it is only too apparent that the contrary is true.

I feel sure that some of the advocates of this measure are entirely misinformed with reference to the race question in the South. They have taken the statements of political agitators and proceeded on the wrong theory, and are absolutely ignorant of conditions as they really exist, magnifying infrequent and exceptional cases, totally ignoring the general amity prevailing there between the races. If I should desire to inform myself upon the matter of the conditions existing in the western part of this country with reference to the differences, if any, that exist between the white people there and the Japanese or Chinese, or upon any other matter which affected their welfare and happiness, I would not be governed by statements of those thoroughly unacquainted with that great section and her splendid people; rather would I take the advice of the Members of this House from that section, the real representatives of the sentiment and intelligence of that splendid section and her great people.

The people whom I have the honor to represent are willing that a great question like the race question should be left to the best judgment of the white citizens of any other section affected, and earnestly demand the same rights for themselves.

It would be ridiculous for Congress to say that in the city of New York, because of the fact that 500 murders were committed there in a single year, that it should pass a law penalizing the State and municipal authorities for allowing this condition of affairs to exist. We must leave the solution of such a problem as this to the people and the officials of the State of New York.

I dare say there is more misinformation in the matter of the race question than on any other question which has engaged the attention of the country since the establishment of the Government. We people down South who have had to deal with the Negro, in slavery and in freedom, have profited by our experience, and we understand better how to cope with the situation than do the people of any other section, however honest and conscientious some of them are in devising schemes to perfect amity between the white man and the black man.

My people, civilians and officers, understand the problem with which we are dealing and how best to meet and solve it. We are not novices; we handle in a practical, common-sense way, and the light that guides us is the light of knowledge and experience. We have learned because we live in close, intimate touch with the situation, and are not guided in our actions by theorists and agitators, many of whom are influenced by their provincial prejudice and ignorance, and by political considerations. Narrow and narrowing, these self-appointed guardians of the consciences and the well-being of my people, white and black, would sow discord among the races, and we who must live there would reap a whirlwind of disorder, chaos, and bloodshed.

Leave us to solve this problem, the most momentous one which has confronted any people in any age, as best we may. We must be left unhampered in working out a solution. The man who does not live in the South can not understand nor even begin to appreciate the conditions confronting the people of that section. We are patient and forbearing with the black man, we who have known him long and intimately. The Negro is safeguarded in his property rights by the laws and the courts. He is not accorded social equality with the white race, and he never will be. If let alone by ignorant or vicious agitators, the Negro in the South would not aspire to this abortive condition.

People of the North who have not lived among the Negroes do not understand the situation in the South. I have talked with a number of people of this class who came South to live. After living there for a time they gain some knowledge on the subject, and in many instances have said they thought the people of the South should be commended for the just and equitable treatment which they found the Negro received at the hands of the native southerner. The northern man who all his life has been led to believe that the people of the South were unjust to the colored race and comes there with preconceived ideas of what the correct attitude should be, is quickly disillusioned. In many, very many instances, such a man is not at all tolerant of the shortcomings of the black man and becomes his foe rather than his friend. Having been taught to believe that the only essential difference between the two races is in the color of their skin, he expects the Negro to measure up to a standard to which the laws of nature and of nature's God has not called him. He is unprepared for what he encounters, and as a consequence loses all his patience and self-restraint, and oftentimes assumes an attitude of antagonism which the southern white man would never think of taking, because he knows the faults and frailties of the inferior race, and excuses and condones his shortcomings. The northern man, ignorant of the barriers which forever preclude the two races living on terms of social and political equality, would crown him as a martyr; enlightened as to the vast difference between the white man and the Negro, he quickly becomes impatient and intolerant, and crucifies him because he does not comprehend and appreciate his peculiar, but natural, inferiority. The pendulum swings all the one way or all the other. He is ready, first to crown, then to crucify. The middle course, the one which my people have adopted, and which means counsel and advice, patience, forbearance, and toleration is the only one which should be followed. This is the policy pursued by my people, and all fair-minded and just men must acknowledge that those who understand this subject should be left free to work it out along the lines that experience has shown to be the better way.

I make my appeal to the fair-minded and patriotic men of the East, the West, and the North to join hands with the men of the South and put to rout the proponents of this unnecessary, unconstitutional, harmful, and dangerous measure.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if this measure is placed on the statute books of this country it is going to weaken local responsibility and will be an encouragement to the viciously inclined. By the growth of a healthy public sentiment mob law is greatly on the wane in the South, but enact this bill and there will be a lessening of the efforts to check and abate it. The citizen will feel that the matter has passed out of his hands since the Federal Government has intervened, and will look to the Government to control and punish. He will feel that the United States has usurped his functions in this regard. Local officials will take much the same view and will not be so keenly alive to their own individual responsibility. The imposition of a penalty on a county or parish will not deter the members of a mob. The criminally inclined will draw surcease from the provisions of this bill. Gaining the impression that the power of the National Government will save him from the wrath of the mob, he thus is encouraged to commit the unspeakable crime. Instead of making for law and order, it will be but a breeder of disregard for law, and encourage the brute to seek to gratify his unholy propensiites, imagining himself secure because a law has been placed on the statute books which penalizes the county where a lynching occurs and imprisons those who dare lay hands on him.

The Constitution of the United States declares that "the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited to it by the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." This proposed measure plainly violates this provision of the Constitution of the United States and aims at the destruction of local self-government.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that I deplore the rapid change in our Government from a democracy to a bureaucracy, and unless we turn about and retrace our steps the people of this country will soon awake to the realization that they have no local self-government and are living under a centralized form of government, with their everyday actions directed and controlled by Federal agencies. If demands for legislation of this character are acceded to by the Congress, there will be no limit it will not be urged to go and which it can consistently refuse to grant. Let me, then, appeal to Members of this House, regardless of the section from whence you come, to stand together and resist and defeat this assault upon the Constitution and the inherent rights of the States guaranteed to them by the provisions of that immortal document. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I believe that Abraham Lincoln would turn in his grave if he thought that 60 years after the emancipation proclamation a Republican House would hesitate to pass legislation to protect colored people from being deprived of their lives without due process of law, and I fail to follow the logic or the political tactics of my Republican colleagues who try to pretend that this legislation is not aimed at special sections of the South. The spirit of Abraham Lincoln still lives and the Federal Government is obliged to take cognizance of the hideous plague of lynching and provide a penalty so drastic as to render it dangerous for future mobs to indulge in.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. UPSHAW. There is no reference whatever to colored people in this bill.

Mr. FISH. That is the exact point, and I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that the reason for this bill, and in my mind the sole justification for the bill, is that his State and a few other States like his own fail to prosecute the lynchers.

Mr. UPSHAW again rose.

Mr. FISH. Does the gentleman want to ask me a question?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Proceed.

Mr. UPSHAW. I just want to ask the gentleman if he realizes that there has never been a lynching in Georgia in which there has not been an effort on the part of the State to punish the lynchers? And I wish to say further that the editorial just read from the New York Tribune does not bring out the fact that Georgia has had a thousand times greater provocation for lynching than New York has had.

Mr. FISH. I will ask how many men have been convicted for lynching in the State of Georgia?

Mr. UPSHAW. I do not know exactly how many men have been convicted.

Mr. FISH. Has a single one been convicted?

Mr. UPSHAW. Yes; a number of them.

Mr. FISH. And sent to jail?

Mr. UPSHAW. Many of them have.

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and sent to the penitentiary, too, in Alabama.

Mr. FISH. The State of Georgia has an average of 10 lynchings a year, whereas the State of Virginia has no more lynchings than the Northern States, and in each case in the State of Virginia the lynchers have been prosecuted and convicted. It is only for your State of Georgia and others like her that we are obliged to enact Federal legislation to enforce the fourteenth amendment. [Applause.]

I will say, furthermore, to the gentleman from Georgia that it would be far more profitable for a certain Member of the Congress of the United States who declared that American soldiers have been lynched in France and have been hanged without being convicted by court-martial in the American Expeditionary Forces—it would be far more profitable, I say, if that man who made those infamous charges would investigate lynchings in his own State instead of besmirching the record of the American Expeditionary Forces. [Applause.]

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I regret that I can not yield any further.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield further.

Mr. FISH. I can not remain silent on this question. I would be untrue to those colored men of this country who paid the supreme sacrifice, and especially to men of my own command who gave up their lives to make the world safe for democracy, if I failed to advocate the passage of the antilynching bill. Let me tell you something that perhaps you Members of the House do not fully appreciate, and that is that the colored man who went into the war had in his heart the feeling that he was fighting not only to make the world safe for democracy but also to make this country safe for his own race. [Applause.] I wish also to testify to the loyality, fortitude, and bravery of the colored soldiers which compares favorably with any soldiers in the allied armies or our own. Gentlemen, consider the appalling fact that there have been men who wore the uniform lynched by citizens of Georgia. Some of them were innocent, indeed, because only 20 per cent of those who have been lynched were lynched for the crime of rape. I can say further to the gentleman from Georgia, how can he defend the fact that even women have been lynched in the State of Georgia.

Mr. UPSHAW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. No; the gentleman can answer in his own time. I am not a lawyer and do not intend to go into the legal points of the bill, but I have had political experience enough to know that it will be contested and disputed on constitutional grounds to the very end. It will be up to the Supreme Court finally to pass on the constitutionality of the antilynching bill and not the eminent constitutional lawyers of the House.

I have sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and on that account, if for no other reason, it would be my sacred duty as a Member of the House of Representatives to vote for a drastic antilynching bill to protect the rights and lives of American citizens everywhere in the United States and put an end to lawlessness, which threatens the administration of justice. Who can tell, if lynching is not suppressed, when it will spread to take in the unpopular employer or capitalist and even public officials while enforcing the law?

My distinguished colleague, Mr. ANSORGE, of New York, representing a constituency of nearly half a million people, of whom 100,000 are colored men and women, has clearly pointed out the fact that members of a lynching mob in the South are seldom apprehended, rarely prosecuted by the local or State authorities, and almost never convicted.

Of all the dastardly and cowardly crimes lynching is the worst because the lynchers are armed to the teeth and the victim is generally an unarmed person in the custody of the sheriff or local official. The mob is composed of cowardly ruffians, and unless drastic legislation is passed and enforced the spirit of lawlessness will run riot throughout the country. As for me, I do not think the bill is drastic enough; it should provide for machine guns in all county jails where lynching is rampant for use against mobs who attempt to substitute their desires for the orderly process of the law and thereby subvert our Republican form of government.

The advocates of this bill do not believe that its passage will solve the racial question, but they believe that it is a step in the right direction. Personally I advocate the creation of a commission to examine into the economic and political status of the colored people and report back to the House a comprehensive plan for the betterment of their condition and assure them equal protection and equal opportunity under the law.

Mr. BRAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I will.

Mr. BRAND. Has the gentleman any information in regard to the first lynching that occurred in Georgia?

Mr. FISH. There have been lynchings there for 50 years.

Mr. BRAND. Has the gentleman any information as to when the first lynching occurred in Georgia?

Mr. FISH. I do not know when the first occurred.

Mr. BRAND. The first lynching which ever occurred in Georgia, so far as I can gather, was in 1865. A Negro man raped a white woman in Gwinnett County. He fled for protection to Lawrenceville, where a company of Federal soldiers was stationed. When learning the facts, they took him in custody and hanged him in the courthouse square. The lynchers were partly from your own State and other States north of the Mason and Dixon line.

Mr. FISH. It is the exception that proves the rule. There have been lynchings in Georgia for 50 years, and it exists to-day, so that colored citizens are forced to come to Congress and ask for protection of their lives. And if you Republicans fail to pass the bill, you will spread discouragement among the colored people throughout the land who have been given to understand that the Republican Party was going to do everything in its power to provide that the colored citizen should have equal rights under the law and that his life will be protected everywhere in the United States. The colored citizen will not only be disappointed and discouraged, but he will believe that Congress has turned a deaf ear to his plea for simple justice, if some of you wavering Republicans fail to support the bill for disputed constitutional reasons. The rejection of the bill will close the door of hope and do much to aggravate the racial problem.

This is meritorious legislation, legislation which we have promised to the colored people in our party platform. We owe it to ourselves and to those colored people who fought in our Army and to their kin; we owe it to our party, to tell the people in the South that the antilynching bill is aimed against special counties and States in the South, and if they can not and will not enforce the laws, if they will not prosecute the lynchers, then the Federal Government will do it for them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman think he is interpreting the act of the Republican Party in that?

Mr. FISH. The Republican Party has written it into its platform and it has no apology to make for the antilynching bill.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman does not approve of the mob in East St. Louis. Would not the gentleman favor an amendment to this bill so that it would include the riot like that in East St. Louis where 25 or 30 people were killed?

Mr. FISH. I would favor some amendments to this bill. I understand that quite a few believe that the bill should be amended. In my opinion, however, many Members of the House are wasting their time discussing the bill from a constitutional point of view before the provisions of the bill are perfected by amendments.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does not the gentleman understand that this bill would not punish the mob in East St. Louis that killed a number of colored people?

Mr. FISH. In that case men were prosecuted and convicted. I think six white men are now in jail for having taken part in that riot. I ask the gentleman is there a single white man in the State of Texas now in jail who took part in any lynching? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, there have been long and able arguments on the constitutionality of this bill, likewise on the policy of Congress in enacting this legislation. It may be a pleasant diversion to depart from the constitutional argument and refer to some of the wonderful speeches made on the bill. In this connection, my attention is drawn to a speech on the antilynching bill delivered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] when the rule making the bill in order was under discussion. I am sorry the gentleman is not on the floor of the House at this time. This was on December 17 last, and the address may be found on pages 458 to 468 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. The speech contains some features that are usual and some that are unusual; usual because, like some others on the same subject, it contains little, if any, information, and unusual because the speaker justifies lynching and defies Congress to enact any legislation that will prevent or tend to lessen the evil. He also bemoans the Nation's fall from greatness, prophesies the ultimate collapse of people's rights under the Constitution, and looks into the future with all the bewailing of the old-time, worn-out Democratic alarm. Gentlemen, have you read it? Have you analyzed or attempted to analyze it? Have you spent any time on it? Have you paid any attention to it? I doubt that anyone has given it any thought whatever.

It is not my part to search out the unusual and the grotesque. I have even less disposition to follow up inaccuracies, to dispute strange and unseasonal conclusions, or even indulge in controversy with one who indirectly advances the astounding argument that because the Constitution does not affirmatively prohibit lynching therefore it is to be recognized as one of the permanent institutions of the country. That it shall abideth now and forever, world without end. I have no time to dispute with or even disturb the mental peace of one who reaches such a happy and comfortable conclusion, placing its foundation not only on the Justinian Code and the Magna Charta, but all other laws of God, man, and nature, including the Constitution of the United States of America. As one of the interpreters of the Constitution, as one who gives the innermost thoughts of the framers, as they struggled to weave our fundamental and basic law, the gentleman from the Lone Star State stands out at once as truly original. I commend his treatise if you are not particular about historical accuracy. Some of his sentences are rather twisted, the periods a little snarled, the meaning somewhat obscure, but still he sails over what he called "unmuffled waters." Here is one academic gem, tossed out when discoursing under the head of "Constituent character." Listen to this, and I quote from page 461, left-hand column, near the top:

> But the purest and truest patriotism was the ruling passion and the doubts and misgivings and adversities of centuries of failure gave the nerve and caution essential to the success which was the crown of rejoicing sure to adorn the brow of consecration and unfading immortality.

[Laughter.]

It has been suggested that buried somewhere in this Macaulay-like passage is the true idea which later developed into the constitutional right to hang "niggers." No, gentlemen, it is not a quotation from Dr. Einstein's treatise on gravitation. It is original with the gentleman from Texas. Dr. Einstein has nothing so abstruse.

Now, here again, you students of English diction! Listen to this companion piece handed out while discoursing under the head of "Government spirit and doctrine," and I quote from the same page, column on the right:

> The Constitution with its provisions insisting on individual rights and local self-government, with manifestly necessary and appropriate limitations, led irresistibly to the question of how to apply the specifics of the great system to secure and perpetuate the benefits of the inspired prescription.

This is also original. It is like some of Walt Whitman's poetry—either great stuff or nothing at all; some say it is neither and some say it is both. But, anyway, we are led to believe that the framers of our Constitution worked in this atmosphere with the doors locked and the windows closed. [Laughter.]

We all marvel at the ease with which some men grasp great subjects. We stand amazed in the presence of one who masters the intricate and involved things of life, which have so long bothered the little mind of man. We are all now refreshed and made comfortable by the harmoniously assembled details of how the Constitution was brought into being, all gathered, clarified, and rectified by the gentleman from Texas. It is difficult to appreciate that the world has so long stood in doubt. And it is all about hanging colored folks in the South! Is a measure tending to prevent or lessen lynching in the South an interference with personal liberty? Seems so, from the gentleman's argument. Even more, lynching seems to have something of a Biblical basis. Under the subhead "Individual liberty and responsibility of divine origin" the learned gentleman goes on to say that the ideals written into the Constitution hailed from Mount Sinai, were embodied in the Decalogue, were written on the tables of stone, and were taught by the Mosaic law. It is interesting to observe some of these events were rather far apart. Is it possible that the gentleman is proceeding along the theory that acts not expressly prohibited are permissible? Are we to understand that since these ideals of which he speaks are collectively woven into the Constitution and that lynching is not expressly ruled out that, for that reason, lynching is after all not forbidden by divine law? But the gentleman continues:

> The God-given Ten Commandments are not intended to be collective or in the plural number.

The only inference from this weighty suggestion is that when two or more are gathered together and go out lynching a poor devil no admonition of the Ten Commandments is disturbed, nor is there in the act aught that is violative of the teachings of Holy Writ. [Laughter.] This brilliant idea may grow on the gentleman to such an extent that in subsequent reversions and extensions we may be prepared to find positive affirmative divine sanction. [Laughter.] This when the whole world knows, and every human being brought up in our Christian civilization must know, that lynching is forbidden by every law of God and man written or spoken since the world began! [Applause.] Strange doctrine this, wonderful discovery. The more I read the gentleman's address, the more I am profoundly impressed with the thought of how much time has been wasted on the organization of our courts of justice.

In another part of his address the gentleman sort of shifts gear, so to speak, and enters into something of a feeble denunciation of lynching, coupling up, however, this modest protest with a forceful reference to the enormity of the black man's crimes. Then, further, as if apologizing for even this gentle reference he comes forth by saying "not a spot on earth can be located where the infuriated multitudes will not override every barrier to avenge the pitiless horror," thereby uttering a challenge to the law-making power of the Government and defiance to our civil institutions.

Who is there in the name of God who condones the black man's crime against womanhood? It is unthinkable that there should be such. White men and black men alike condemn it. My God, gentlemen, where are your courts? What are they there for, if not to give speedy trial and swift justice? Is it not the character of punishment for crime whereof the accused has been convicted that is shocking the people of the Nation. We give you our approval of the severest penalty—whatever your statutes provide, but the Nation, its people, would be failing in its duty should it not put forth every endeavor to see that every man, white, black, yellow, or red, has a trial in conformity to law. What has aroused and horrified the people, and I am using the word "people" advisedly, is that human life is taken without the semblance of trial, in which the guilt or innocence of the accused is determined. [Applause.]

We as a Nation know too well the efficacy of the orderly administration of justice. Those communities in which lynchings are of frequent occurrence must learn now that the patience of liberty-loving America is about exhausted. There are no "ifs" and "ands" about it. This bill, amended or unamended, will pass, and those communities can take the consequences or leave them alone. The decision is up to them. [Applause.]

There never was a case of mob violence but that every personal safeguard, constitutional, legal, and moral, was overridden with heartless impunity. There never was a case of lynching but that every law, so carefully woven into our civil fabric was defied and every element of orderly, organized government for the time was overthrown. [Applause.] Courts and public officials and sometimes State executives make formal protest, but on the whole these protests were becomingly modest and dealt with the offending community with a sort of gingerly sensitiveness.

All the American people ask is that every offender shall be indicted and tried according to the law of the land, as you have made it, and that if innocent, he be set free, if guilty he be punished according to its provisions; or, in other words, that the personal safeguards in the Constitution, set forth in the Bill of Rights, shall abide without reference to geography. To this demand the East, West, North, and South must yield, we all hope gracefully and becomingly. Hurling defiance at an act of Congress or a pending act has somehow an ancient ring, but all that is a part of the history of the past. We are now living in an advancing age, and let us hope in a better-poised age, the gentleman from Texas notwithstanding. [Applause.]

But the ill-tempered outburst of the gentleman's speech comes when he approaches what might be termed the political angle. Of the bill he says, "Its political spirit is partisan greed," "its political principle is sectional hate," and one would think there is no help in us; "that they—the Republican Party—are devoid of respect for the Constitution, as they have often been," and so forth; that—> it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that desperate political fear has driven the Republican Party into their hateful temper of the "bloody-shirt" régime—that disgraceful and shameful reconstruction era of "spoils and persecution."

Strange voice this, of the gentleman from Texas, crying out in the wilderness. And then, bracing his feet, he lunges out this charming and touching sentiment:

> Coming down, Mr. Chairman, to the spiritual merit of this Dyer bill and its kindred measures, which constitute the summum malum of the entire dastardly budget of unpatriotic wickedness leveled so unscrupulously at the heart of the Nation, the astounding fact is that such a practically impossible proposition could even have a day in court.

Presently, as if Zion is repenting of its wickedness, he comes down to earth and habitation with the soothing and comforting assurance that "we have no antipathy to our colored population." Tenderly, fatherly sentiment! [Laughter.]

But his speech is singularly out of place in Congress. Better would it have been for him had he not made it. It may sound all right in Texas, but it is out of tune here—another sweet bell out of tune. I can see the gentleman down on his native heath, in the busy and crowded marts of Cat Springs and Driftwood, or perhaps out amid the multitudes of String Prairie, or over in that other great glowing city of Mud, almost celestial in beauty and repose, standing on his tiptoes and "letting 'er fly" before an admiring constituency. [Laughter.] Or, farther over in his district, down in "that fair land of flowers and flowery land of the fair," at the delightfully poetic city of Jonah—the name is good to be heard of by white men but enough to scare a "nigger" to death—holding his admirers in wondering amazement of how he told them right to their faces where the grand old Republican Party was to "head in." [Laughter.] O, my worn and weary brother, the grand old Republican Party has heard worse things than that since it came into being. It has heard them since ere the little morning stars sang together, and it may and probably will hear more of them before its star is set. Lincoln heard the same thing in his day. He who stood in matchless majesty in life, and now stands consecrated in death, he heard the same unkind things said of him. But, brother, do you know that the light of his seemingly inspired life will glow in transcendent, celestial beauty as long as the sea and the sky are blue? [Applause.]

His immortal emancipation proclamation was the "summum malum" of its times—"the entire dastardly budget of unpatriotic wickedness leveled so unscrupulously at the heart of the Nation." "With malice toward none, with charity for all, with a firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right"—nobler words never fell from the pen of man—these, I suppose, were founded in "sectional hate," and were a part of "the dastardly budget of unpatriotic wickedness of its time." [Applause.]

I do not want to be offensive in this address. I do not mean to be, but if I should be, I would then be on a par with the gentleman from Texas. Whether he intended to be really offensive, I do not know, neither do I care, but we can all read his address and judge for ourselves. As an exhibition of bitter partisanship, as a specimen of narrow sectional prejudice, as an illustration of an apparently unsatisfied hatred of the Republican Party, the address of the gentleman stands without a rival since I have been a Member of this body. Democrats of his brand are all gone but him. Really, I did not know there were any of them left. I had thought they had all gone along with the passing of the buffalo and the long-horned steer. [Laughter.] But it seems there is at least one left—one of those "rock-ribbed and ancient-as-the-sun" kind, who, like poor Rachel of old, still grieves over her lost children and refuses to be comforted because they were not. The speech of the gentleman is just about as much out of place in this day and generation as a sod house on Fifth Avenue. [Laughter.] One would think the Republican Party is the double-distilled quintessence of deviltry, if the gentleman means what he says.

But the gentleman can wave his puny little hands and chatter his full; the grand old party will go right along its way and about its business as if this deluge of the gentleman from Texas had never come. [Applause.] It will brush these little rantings aside as the busy housewife brushes the idle cobweb from the ceiling—and there is a similarity between the two. [Applause.]

Really his address sounds more like an order sending shock troops into action at a Democratic rally. [Laughter.]

If the gentleman was not taking himself so seriously, this address of his would be really funny. The supposedly Latin quotations are off the text, most probably of the home-grown variety, while the combinations of metaphors, similes, and other figures of speech are just about as illuminating as the dark of the moon. The diction is somewhat twisted, snarled: His Lord Chesterfield advice takes on a peculiar slant, but enough can be gained from a careful reading to get the idea that somehow he does not like the Republican Party, nor does he particularly like this antilynching bill. [Laughter.] But, after all, it makes little difference whether the gentleman likes or does not like this bill, and it makes no difference whatever whether he likes or does not like the Republican Party. His political opinions are his own; he is welcome to them. So far as I can see, nobody else wants them. He can hide them under a tin cup or shout them to the wind. He can take any stand he wants in Texas, if he can get away with it, but when he comes upon the floor of the House of Representatives in advocacy of lynching, challenging and daring Congress, he must expect some one to rise up and say, "Here is the sole, surviving remnant of the species." [Laughter.] People fix their estimate of men by what they say; especially is this true of Members of Congress. The public is not slow in cataloguing a man, if he says anything worth while. I have seen no estimate of the gentleman; so far as I know there has been no cataloguing. He has just been overlooked, left alone, as saying nothing worth while. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH].

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODS].

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I would be false to my conception of the duty we in this body owe to the country and to the cause of good citizenship were I to indulge unnecessarily in the expression of any sentiment here that would either arouse or perpetuate any sectional or class or racial hatred. We are one country, and no man is justifiable at this day in doing or saying anything to disturb that unity. If doubt existed in the minds of any as to this unity, surely it was removed by the spectacle of the Spanish-American War and the recent World War when we saw the sons and grandsons of the men who followed Lee keeping step with the sons and grandsons of those who fought under Grant, united under one flag, fighting for one common cause, and that cause the great cause of humanity.

It would serve no good purpose at this remote date to call in question the wisdom of that movement which established the fourteenth amendment and thrust upon the Negro, wholly unprepared for them and without his asking, the duties and obligations of citizenship. Suffice it to say, it was done—mistakenly done—when the bitterness of the then recent strife was still unforgotten and when the minds of men of the North were in no proper frame to enact maturely considered constructive legislation. Without animosity, but recognizing the inflamed conditions, I may say that such legislation was enacted that the Confederate States might drink to its dregs the cup of their humiliation.

The Confederate soldiers—my father among them—as they approached the ballot box to register their wisdom, their counsel, their patriotism, their voice, so sorely needed by their war-wasted Commonwealths, were waived aside as if they were lepers and had to cry out "unclean," unfit to approach that ballot box surrounded, as it was, by the newly enfranchised Negro, the carpetbagger, and the scallawag—"apostate for the price of his apostasy"—and this, too, when the only crime of these forbidden was that in courage and in patriotism they had responded to the call of their States in the hour of need. By this procedure you of the North, doubtless to your present regret, taught the Negro to estimate lightly the individual virtues and accomplishments and qualifications of suffrage citizenship and to depend not upon cardinal virtues but to look to the Federal Government to supply not only his needs but his desires as well. You taught him that his advancement would come by governmental donation rather than as a result of his own industry, thrift, and individual merit. He felt that as suffrage had come to him without either his asking or his qualification, he could cease work and the emoluments of office would take care of him. That delusion was not dispelled until the intelligent patriotism of the Southern States struck down these false standards of citizenship set up by their carpetbagger constitutions and established as a prerequisite of citizenship the merits of intelligence, frugality, patriotism—either individual or inherited—and a willingness to contribute to the education of the children of the land, as the price of suffrage. We have taught our people to look upon suffrage citizenship as a thing to be achieved. I submit to you in all seriousness the question, Which plan is the better calculated to develop a worthy citizenship? Which plan holds out to the Negro, even, the greater incentive to worthy achievement, and which plan will more likely bring to the States due appreciation of the obligation—they having made suffrage citizenship a thing to be achieved or merited—they owe to jealously guard and protect the citizenship and to give to every class of citizenship equal protection before the law?

I submit that the Southern States, by their action, have taken a long step forward toward a higher citizenship. They have shown not only a disposition but an ability to work out these problems. They realize their obligation and recognize that the responsibility is theirs. We of the South are glad to have your tolerance and your sympathy, and your moral support, but with equal earnestness we insist that you leave the solution of this and all kindred questions to the common sense, courage, and patriotism of the southern people—that patriotism which has made glorious the history of this country—and we solemnly promise you that we will solve this and all kindred questions to the honor of your section and ours and not to the ruin or disgrace of either.

The proponents of this bill are taking a step backward. They are overturning the very spirit and philosophy upon which this governmental institution was founded. That philosophy and spirit found its essence in the simple, well recognized principle that that Government is best which is nearest the people, that that Government is best which leaves the administration of the so-called "police powers" to the States. This bill, commonly known as the "antilynching bill," would be described more accurately if designated—from the standpoint of its effect rather than from its purpose—as a "bill to override the Constitution of the United States, to foment race hatred, and to revive sectional animosity." If it were possible to put an end to lynching by a lawful act of Congress, none would support such legislation more earnestly than we of the South. I realize as fully as you do that when, without trial, men "swing up" the man they "swing down" the law. Not a Member on our side of the House has raised his voice in defense of this brutal and cowardly crime. The sentiment of our best citizens deplores its existence. I saw the aftermath of one mob in my home city in Virginia. A colored man had been arrested for a most brutal assault upon an elderly woman for the purpose of robbery. On account of the extreme brutality the community was greatly inflamed. The spirit of the cave man was asserting itself, and rising even above the law. To protect the accused, who had been placed in jail, from the curious and threatening mob that was forming around it, the mayor went to the extent of calling out the local military company.

The mayor was a Confederate soldier. He had led his company in Pickett's charge at Gettysburg. Two-thirds of them never returned from that gory field, and though his charge did not succeed and later on the cause that he fought for was denominated the "lost cause," yet he and his comrades—my own uncle among them, whose body still fills an unmarked grave there—on that summer day, made a mark in history that will survive as long as the language of valorous deeds shall be read among men. I mention this simply to show that that mayor did not lack the element of personal courage; that he did not fail in a firm resolve to discharge the duty that the law placed upon him. He stood at the front steps of the jail until he was shot and wounded, and when the mob tried to batter in the doors of the jail the military company fired upon it, killing 12 men, some of them innocent bystanders. The prisoner was spirited away to a place of supposed safety, yet five or six hours afterwards, in the early morning hours, he was taken and lynched by the mob. I submit to you that the authorities of Virginia made a bona fide and determined effort and sacrifice to give to that prisoner the protection that the law afforded. What else could have been done? Were not the sacrifices sufficient? And yet under this bill that community and that old State—whose very graves make her still glorious—would be penalized $10,000, and her faithful officials haled before a Federal court for trial under a Federal law enacted by a remote body. In the past 13 years Virginia has had, I believe, according to the records, only six lynchings. There is nothing in the hearings to show whether the persons lynched were in custody or not. There is nothing whatever to show but that the State made every effort not only to prevent lynchings but to bring the lynchers to prompt trial, and yet it is proposed by this measure to deprive Virginia, and it is but one of 48 States, of its right—its constitutional right, if you please—to exercise its own police powers and to regulate in any way it deems most effective its domestic affairs. I would remind you that the mobs formed in the South are different apparently from those formed in the North in that the animus of the mob in the South is directed against the individual, while in the North it is directed toward the race.

The last lynching that occurred in Virginia was one of two young Negro tramps who had brutally beaten to death and robbed an inoffensive and very respectable aged colored man. The lynchers, I am told, were white men—at least one has been tried and convicted for it—who doubtless had a kindly feeling for this old colored man. That lynching is more prevalent in our section of the country than in the North is not because our people are less law-abiding than yourselves. If true, it is due solely to the fact that they have greater and more frequent provocations to yield to the impulse of mob passion.

Will this bill, if enacted into law and upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States—if the unexpected should happen—make less frequent the commission of these crimes which incite lynchings? Will it give to the creature of bestial instinct, drunk with lust, a false sense of security? Will it cause an infuriated mob to forego its vengeance, or will it serve only to intensify the mob's vindictiveness and strengthen its determination? Keeping in mind that the mainspring of the mob is defiance of law, to anyone possessing even the slightest knowledge of human nature, the answers to the foregoing questions are obvious. The best that the majority can hope for from the passage of the bill is to keep within the party fold a while longer those Negroes of the North who have of late shown a tendency to waver in their Republicanism. But for every colored vote which you retain you will suffer the loss of two white votes, the votes of men and women, North as well as South, who resent the attempted invasion of State rights—on the part of some; and I do not believe even on the part of a majority of that side of the House and the partisan exploitation of a problem which calls for profound study and careful handling. Is it not wiser to follow the suggestions, if I correctly interpret them, of the President, whom we all recognize as a man of most generous impulses, to appoint an impartial commission to study and carefully investigate this problem and make recommendations as to the best method of relieving the conditions which we all deplore?

I appeal to the patriotic men on that side to adopt such a course, which I am satisfied will accomplish good results and certainly can do no harm.

The bill in its first section defines a mob as five or more persons. Therefore, so far as the provisions of this bill go, four men, however brutal in their methods and purposes, are immune from punishment. Four can lynch with impunity, so far as this bill is concerned. The third section provides for punishment in the Federal court of the officer failing, neglecting, or refusing to protect his prisoner, matters which should more properly be left to the State court; and the fourth and fifth sections provide punishment for those participating in any mob, penalizing the county in which the lynching takes place to the extent of $10,000, which shall be paid to the family or heirs of the person lynched, and even extends so far as to provide that if the lynched person is carried through even the slightest portion of any county, and without even the knowledge on the part of such county officers or a single citizen of the county, that county must forfeit $10,000, and this without any opportunity whatever on the part of the county to prevent such conduct.

THE PROPOSED LEGISLATION UNCONSTITUTIONAL.

The proponents of the measure claim its constitutional warrant is found in the fifth clause of the fourteenth amendment, providing in substance:

> * * * Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction equal protection of the law.

And in section 5 Congress is given power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this amendment. It will be noted that the inhibition applies to the States and may extend to political subdivisions of the States as well as to officials as representatives of the State, but by no enlargement of its construction could it be held to extend to the acts of individuals in the State. Its purpose and meaning was to prohibit the States from taking affirmative action, by statute or otherwise, to deny equal protection of the laws to all classes of its citizens. It never was intended and has never been construed to give to the Federal Government the right to supplant the States in the exercising of their "police powers" and of control over the domestic affairs of their people. The effect of this bill is to deprive the States of that power.

The Supreme Court of the United States has repeatedly held that no such power is given to Congress by this amendment. No argument has been advanced here to seriously contend that this measure is within the scope of the Constitution. The fact that it is unconstitutional ought to deter us from its passage, regardless of the fact that it is inexpedient and will be ineffective.

We can not do better than in this instance follow the advice of Abraham Lincoln, who at Cooper Union in 1860 said:

> No man who has sworn to support the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it.

President Harding, in his message, has said recently, speaking of this question:

> Some of the difficulties might be ameliorated by a humane and enlightened consideration of it, a study of its many aspects, and an effort to formulate, if not a policy, at least a national attitude of mind calculated to bring about the most satisfactory possible adjustment of relations between the races and of each race to the national life.

President Wilson in one of his messages called attention to the conditions existing, but his appeal, and, as I understand, President Harding's, is an appeal to the public conscience on this question, calling for profound study, but nowhere recommending action such as this by Congress. The Attorney General does not personally approve its validity. One of his assistants, Mr. Goff, if I correctly understand him, claims that Congress can determine as a "legislative fact" that citizens are being deprived of equal protection of the law, and Congress may, therefore, pass an act punishing murder in the States. The Assistant Attorney General was asked:

> Would you carry that further to burglary, larceny, and assault and battery?
> Mr. GOFF. Of course, the principle would carry us there.

Lynching is but murder; and if, as Mr. Goff says, we can by Federal statute punish the crime of lynching perpetrated by individuals composing a mob, there is no escape from the conclusion that by Federal statute we can extend the jurisdiction of the Federal Government into all the States and against all crimes affecting life, liberty, or property of citizens of the various States. The result would be to flood the States with a swarm of carpetbagger, pie-eating Federal officers to punish every crime known to the law.

The Supreme Court, in Sixteenth Wallace, as early as 1873 said in discussing the effect of this amendment:

> * * * When the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character, when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other, and of both of these Governments to the people, the argument—illustrating what could be done under such a power, as I have undertaken to illustrate what could be done under this bill—has a force that is irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt. We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.

In the United States against Cruikshank case, decided in 1875, Ninety-second United States, 542, which arose under the act of 1870, known as the enforcement act, the act prohibited two or more persons from conspiring together with intent to violate the act, or intimidate any citizen from exercising and enjoying the right secured to him by the Constitution and laws of the United States, making the action a felony. Cruikshank and his associates were tried in the District Court of Louisiana for violation of this act and convicted. The Supreme Court, however, held that the fourteenth amendment does not undertake to create any additional guaranty as among the citizens of the States, the court using this language:

> The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any persons within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it, * * * add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. * * * Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there.

Also the case of United States v. Harris (106 U. S., p. 629), a lynching case. The mob had taken the prisoners away from the deputy sheriff, and Harris and 19 others were indicted for taking the prisoners from the custody of the officers and beating and wounding them. The indictment was drawn under section 5519 of the Revised Statutes, similar in some respects to the provisions of the bill under consideration. The court said in passing upon the validity of this statute, which had been passed by Congress:

> It is, however, strenuously insisted that the legislation under consideration finds its warrant in the first and fifth sections of the fourteenth amendment. The first section declares, "* * * nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

This case is apparently on "all fours" with the principles embodied in this bill, and it is sufficient to convince any fair-minded man that this bill is brought under the condemnation of the Supreme Court of the United States.

To the same effect and upholding the same principles is the case arising in Virginia and decided by the Supreme Court. (Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S., 313.) All of these cases hold that the object of the Federal amendment was to prohibit the States from passing any law affirmatively denying to one class of citizens equal protection of the law. Nowhere can it be shown in any case that the scope of the amendment has been extended so as to apply to acts of mere omission on the part of the States. In the Rives case the judge had by affirmative action excluded Negro citizens when he made up his jury list. This amounted to a denial of a right to them—if you please, an affirmative denial—by an agency of the State government of a legal right.

In the "Civil Rights cases," decided in One hundred and ninth United States, page 3, the court, speaking of the fourteenth amendment, says:

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the law. * * * To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. * * * It is absurd to affirm that because the rights of life, liberty, and property—which include all civil rights that men have—are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case, and that because the denial by a State to any persons of equal protection of the laws is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection. This is not corrective legislation; it is primary and direct; it takes immediate and absolute possession of the subject of the right of admission to inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement. It supersedes and displaces State legislation on the same subject or only allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national legislation.

The court holds that such attempted invasions of the constitutional functions of the States by Congress is void.

In the case of James v. Bowman (190 U. S.) by Mr. Justice Brewer the foregoing authorities were reviewed and approved, and it was again declared that Congress has no power under these amendments to protect one citizen of a State against wrongs committed against his person or property by another citizen.

The Riggins case has been cited under sections 5508 and 5509 of the Revised Statutes. Riggins and his coconspirators took Maples, a Negro, from the custody of the sheriff and National Guard troops in Alabama and hanged him. The indictment charged that the act was done because Maples was a Negro, that it was done to deprive him of his rights to trial, and so forth. The court denied Riggins a discharge on his habeas corpus, proceedings instituted on the ground that the charge under which he was held constituted no offense against the laws of the United States, and on the theory of that case, upholding the statutes mentioned, the bill under consideration seems to have been drawn. The foundation upon which it is built, however, is one of sand. The same judge later in the Powell case, reported in 151 Federal Reporter, page 648, Powell being jointly indicted with Riggins for the same offense, reversed his decision on the Riggins case and discharged Powell, indicted for the same offense. The Riggins case was a lynching case similar to other lynchings where the person lynched is taken from the custody of the sheriff by a mob. After the Riggins opinion was handed down, however, and before the court had passed upon the Powell companion case, the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Hodge (203 U. S., 1) overruled the decision followed by the lower court in the Riggins case, and clearly held that no power resides in the Federal courts to punish any citizen of a State for acts of violence committed against another. The Government appealed the Powell case in which the lower court, deciding the Riggins case, had reversed itself and the Supreme Court held that there was no power in the Federal Government by statute to punish such offense, and affirmed the lower court's decision in the Powell case. (212 U. S., 564.)

My time is limited and I refer only to section 5 of this act, which provides for the imposition of penalties upon counties in which lynchings occur and upon those through which the intended victim may be carried to execution. We may search in vain for any warrant in the Constitution by which the Federal Government may tax States or any political subdivision of a State.

If the Federal Government can impose penalties upon counties it can impose penalties upon States and, carried to its logical conclusion, it can therefore impose penalties that can not be borne by the States and thus entirely deprive the States of existence. If it can fine or imprison the sheriff of a county for acts of omission of this character, it can fine and imprison the governor or the legislators of a State and thus entirely deprive the States of all power.

I can not conceive of greater violence to the Constitution than the provisions of this bill make possible. I quote from Cooley on constitutional limitations:

In the American system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and it can not be taken from them, either wholly or in part, and exercised under legislation of Congress. Neither can the National Government, through any of its departments or officers, assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States. All that the Federal authority can do is to see that the States do not, under cover of this power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any authority which the Constitution has confided to the Nation, or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution (p. 831).

It is unnecessary to cite further authorities. They are all one in upholding the rights reserved to the States by the Constitution, in regulating their "police powers," their domestic relations, and the conduct of their citizens as individuals. In fact, this power was so fully recognized and understood that the proponents of effective Federal legislation on prohibition required a constitutional amendment.

THE SINCERITY OF THE PROPOSAL DOUBTED.

This bill is put forward by the Republican Party, though many Members of that party here will not vote for it, and many of the strongest arguments that have been made against it have come from the Republican side of the House. Practically no Democrats are supporting it. On the part of some, though I would not say all, it is a bold attempt to hold in line the Negro vote in the border States.

Just how much sincerity is behind the proposal may to some extent be indicated by the recent attitude of the Republican Party in Virginia toward the Negro. Its State convention deprived the Negro of participation in the State convention held at Norfolk, though for years that race had furnished the votes upon which Republican officeholders fattened in that State. That convention's State platform declared against the Negro purely for reasons of political expediency, just as this bill for the same reason is put forth. Can it be doubted that the national Republican committee approved this policy?

The Lynchburg News of November 11, 1921, in an editorial, states with reference to that convention's candidate:

When Henry W. Anderson suggests, as he did in his address in Lynchburg, that there are trees available for Negroes who aspire with prospect of success to public office in Virginia, he virtually says, "Give the Negro the right to vote, as the Republican Party advocates in its platform, and upon which platform I plant myself solidly, and the promises of which platform I solemnly pledge myself to carry out, if elected, but if by exercising the right of suffrage we give him the Negro in these 21 counties in which he outnumbers the whites elects one of his own race to office, why lynch him."

It is not contended that this is the exact language of the Republican candidate, but only an interpretation of his speech as given by a highly respectable newspaper. This, however, is not the attitude of Virginia, as has been very clearly shown by the decisive majority recently registered against the Republican candidate. How different from this position is the attitude of the dominant party of Virginia in its effort to see that justice is done toward all its citizens.

I cite only one or two instances. For years in Charlottesville, Va., where the Negro Republican vote outnumbered the white Republican vote, the electoral board had followed the custom of appointing as a representative of the minority one colored judge of elections to serve with two white Democratic judges. A colored judge was appointed as early as 1868. After his death his son succeeded him. One of these judges was probably worth one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars. There was never any complaint raised as to their intelligence, fairness, or conduct in office of any of these colored judges. Just prior to the late State election for the first time the "lily white" Republicans asked that these Negro Republican judges be removed and white Republicans be substituted for them. Of the four, the electoral board substituted two white Republicans in two precincts, but retained the two Negro Republican judges in two wards where the Negro Republicans were largely in the majority in the party. The claim was made that the Negroes were not Republicans, though the evidence showed that they voted for the last presidential candidate and that they were Republicans.

As evidence that the courts of Virginia are not swayed by prejudice or factional party considerations, I quote the court's opinion from the December Virginia Law Register, pages 617 and 618:

Upon the foregoing state of facts this thought presents itself to the court: Is this really a question of judicial relief from a wrong or is it political demagoguery to influence ignorant voters on the race question? When the Negro vote was large, did the white Republicans ever try to repudiate it? If there were now enough Negro voters to carry the State Republican, would this request be made to oust these men? If so, no question of politics is involved. But if the motif of this proceeding is politics and not justice, a court of law could not take jurisdiction. This court will assume as a presumption of law that petitioner is not trying to use this proceeding for political purposes. * * * They claim to be Republicans now. So the issue is whether a man's own volition or that of others makes him a Republican. If the "Lily White" convention can keep the colored man from voting for Republican candidates, then, indeed, is he out of that party. But of all the law quoted none has yet been cited to this effect.

The issue is now reduced to the simple question of whether the Negro shall per se be discriminated against. Whatever others may do, the courts of this State never have and never will do this. * * * And the action of the electoral board in appointing Inge and Coles (Negro judges of election) violates no law or principle of law or justice, in the opinion of the court.

As an evidence of the fair treatment received by this class of citizens in Virginia controlled by the Democratic Party I give the figures furnished by the State auditor, showing that Virginia for State purposes collects from its Negro citizens from capitation taxes $113,482.85, from real estate $80,583.57, from personal property and income $42,902.64. The total from all sources collected from Negro citizens is $236,969.06. The amount expended for State Negro institutions, public education of Negroes, and so forth, is: State institutions, $680,353; public schools, $1,600,000; estimated expense of Negro criminals, $260,000; total, $2,540,353. Notwithstanding this does not include the amount collected from the counties and appropriated to the education of the Negro children, it will be seen that the State is spending on its Negro citizens about $11 for each $1 collected from the people of that race.

I submit to this body that with such a showing on the part of Virginia—and I have no doubt the same showing can be made by the other Southern States—it can not be successfully contended that there is any disposition whatever among the best sentiment of these various States to be unjust toward any class of their citizenship. This attitude so clearly shown ought not be disturbed by Federal legislation. The responsibility which we recognize as ours and which we are discharging and will continue to discharge in good faith should not be divided. Any attempt on the part of the Federal Government to interfere with these conditions, to divide this responsibility, or to hinder the people of the South in the just solution of this and all kindred questions, peculiarly theirs, will be met with disfavor, if not, indeed, with resentment, on the part of the South. We have made citizenship dependent upon merit and thus given incentive to all classes.

The best people of the two races in the South are in the main in accord as to the best methods of handling the problem. The southern white man is to-day the Negro's best friend. He has a deeper appreciation of his good qualities and more genuine sympathy for his weaknesses. You had as well here and now recognize the fact that frugality, patriotism, and intelligence will remain the test of citizenship in the South, and this further fact had as well be recognized now and always—never to be forgotten—you may write it on your parchments, you may grave it with your pen of iron upon the rock, that just as true as patriotic, united intelligence is the only human power that can not be withstood, just that true is it that united, patriotic intelligence will rule the South.

I know the temper of my people. When you override or trench upon the Constitution in favor of a particular class you are sowing to the wind.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that I have not the time to analyze this painfully complex subject. I deny to the State the right to inflict capital punishment. I deny that society as a whole is justified in taking human life. I certainly deny that right to the individual or to the mob. Every manifestation of passion, hatred, or violence which results in the destruction of human life is abhorrent to every civilized man. I wish this subject were not discussed either as a partisan or as a sectional subject. Since the war particularly, since human life has become cheap, and since young men of refinement have been taught to bayonet and kill their fellow men, mob violence has spread throughout the country and mob action has become a national curse. It is no longer a sectional question. Nor does the colored race only suffer. Only two days ago it was reported that in the State of Louisiana a mob captured a lawyer who came to defend unpopular defendants, members of the I. W. W. Whether they were I. W. W. men or whether they were not does not matter. It is not a crime in itself to be a member of that body. It is a form of industrial organization with which certain people disagree. A mob kidnaped and maltreated a lawyer, an officer of the court, engaged in the sacred duty of defending men in distress. The mob consisted in all probability of respectable gentlemen, of gentlemen of property.

As a Socialist, believing that the only salvation of the human race is love, guided by intelligence, and that the only process of human civilization should be obedience to the collective expression of an enlightened will, through the duly chosen representatives of the people, I repudiate every form of mob action.

Now a word as to the police power of the Nation. The expression "police power" is improperly interpreted by those who would give a narrow interpretation to the Constitution. The State has become a mere nominal unit of the Nation. The United States to-day is a Nation. It is not a confederacy of States. It is not an American league of nations, a league of 48 sovereign States. Industrial evolution, inventions, the economic course of society have obliterated State boundary lines. The city of Jersey City, in the State of New Jersey, is more a part of the city of New York, in the State of New York, than is Buffalo, although separated technically by State lines. State lines have disappeared. The National Government has such police power as is necessary to effectuate the purposes for which the National Government has been organized and for which it exists. The Nation can, if it desires, punish murder. It can, if it desires, punish mob action. The Nation which assumed the power to enter every home in every State of the Union and conscript every young man, can reach every criminal who deprives an American citizen of elementary rights guaranteed by the American Constitution and by every tenet of civilized society. [Applause.]

That power can not be denied. That power exists outside of the fourteenth amendment. That amendment, designed by its framers for the protection of the helpless, the submerged and unfortunate colored man, has by crooked lawyers been employed to serve for the protection of corporate interests. It has never been used to protect human life or human dignity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman give me two minutes more?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. LONDON. Neither the fourteenth nor the fifteenth amendment is being enforced for the benefit of the Negro.

I look upon the colored man as my weaker and younger brother. I owe him the duty of defending him. He is in a minority. He did not come to the United States of his own free will; he was brought to the United States by force. We should right the wrongs of the past; the sins, not only of the slave owner of the South but of the slave importer of the North. We owe to the Negro our love because of the martyrdom to which we have subjected him. He is not responsible for the carpetbaggers of the reconstruction period. He does not want to dominate nor can he dominate.

Americans are all democrats, but that does not prevent most American people from joining secret societies. There is the one place where everybody has a chance to be higher than somebody else. It is in the secrecy of the lodge room that the humblest man in the full splendor of the regalia of his office becomes the supreme commander of the invisible empire of the inscrutable frog pool. In any event, it is quite a pleasure to think oneself superior. In those sections where the colored people constitute the great majority of the workers and where they have no political rights that their masters are bound to respect, there is in addition to the inevitable tendency of a stronger race to keep down a weaker one the desire on the part of the ruling class to keep the working people in a state of helplessness.

The illiterate and ignorant white worker does not realize that every time the colored worker is deprived of his political, civic or economic rights a blow is being struck at the entire laboring class. Fortunately, the American organized labor movement is beginning to take a more fraternal attitude toward the colored man.

It is rather significant that the largest number of lynchings of colored people occurs in the States where there is the largest illiteracy among the native whites.

I am not sure that this bill is effective. I would like to see it amended. I am a little afraid of politicians. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] is not a politician. He is young in politics, and he has told more of the truth about the bill than the other people on the Republican side. I would hate to see the Negro made the football of politics. No greater misfortune could be visited upon a racial minority.

I want a real antimob bill. I want an effective antilynching bill. I have often wondered why the United States, this most glorious experiment in the building of nations, has not exercised a deeper influence in stimulating democratic thought in other countries. The prediction of Thomas Paine, made after the American Revolution, that by the end of that century every country in Europe would become a republic was not realized. The glory of the United States was dimmed by the shadow of slavery up to 1860. Since then the world's view of America has been obstructed by the lyncher and by the leader of the mob.

No local sentiment, passion, or prejudice should be permitted to defy the legal rights of the humblest citizen. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA] such time as he may desire.

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, the antilynching bill is presented under a claim that its enactment would give further security to human life.

The question before us is not whether there shall be a law to punish lynching. Such a law is on the statute books of every State in the Union. Under the theory and practice of our Government for more than 130 years such offenses have been within the sole jurisdiction of the State. The question is whether or not we shall duplicate the State function by conferring the same power upon the Federal Government as to this class of crimes.

Ours is a Government of divided sovereignties. It is founded on the theory that all rights were originally vested in the people of the various States and that the Federal Government has been delegated only those powers that are essential and appropriate to the exercise of national functions. It was designed that all other powers should remain with the States. Each of these sovereignties, the State and the Nation, was designed to remain separate and supreme within its jurisdiction. This distinction was not founded on any idle or merely scholastic or abstract theory. It was deliberately adopted as part of our system of government by the framers of the Constitution after a profound study of the history of governments. They recognized that if the Republic is to endure to serve mankind, it must be guarded against the autocracy of centralized government as well as against the disintegration that would come from irresponsible, unorganized, uncontrolled powers.

Following out this plan of organization, the duty and responsibility of preserving the security of the lives and bodies of our citizenship, as well as protecting them against the whole category of domestic crimes, was made the function of our State governments. A brief number of crimes not included in State functions were defined under the Federal statutes and penalties provided for such offenses against the national sovereignty.

The general plan of our Government was wisely designed to avoid duplications of jurisdictions and functions. The State and Federal Governments were designed each to perform its separate essential function, coordinating and cooperating. It was readily perceived that the duplication of functions of these two sovereignties meant conflict, discordant functioning, and that each would be weakened by inharmony with the other.

The bill wholly fails to recognize the wholesome wisdom of the separation instead of the duplication of the State and Federal functions established under our plan of government. These features of the bill, as well as the inaptitude of its purposes, will be readily disclosed by examination of its provisions:

(1) It duplicates what should be the sole function of the State. It provides for the trial and punishment of offenses in the Federal courts that are already punishable under the State laws and in the State courts.

(2) Under its provisions the prosecution and punishment or acquittal of offenses in the State courts would not bar another prosecution and punishment in the Federal court. Such a plan is repugnant even to a most crude sense of justice.

(3) It seeks to punish mob murder, but only in those cases where the life of the victim has been taken "for the purpose" of punishing or preventing an "actual or supposed" offense committed by the man who is lynched. It provides no penalty for the crime against those victims of the mob who have committed no crime, "actual or supposed." This act makes the protection of the criminal of higher concern to the Federal Government than the protection of the victim of a mob whose innocence is unquestioned. It authorizes a prosecution against those who lynch the guilty man, but provides no prosecution for those who lynch the man unquestionably innocent.

(4) It makes the officer of the State who fails to perform his duty in apprehending or prosecuting a member of the mob guilty of a felony unless such member of the mob is held for prosecution in the Federal court. Thus in two cases, in each of which the officer has equally failed to do his duty, he is punished in one and not in the other, depending on whether or not some one else unrelated to him has subsequently caused the member of the mob party to be prosecuted in the Federal court. Such a scheme of making an officer punishable for a criminal act, dependent not upon the inherent character of the act but solely upon the conduct of other persons, subsequent to its commission, and for which the officer is in no way responsible, has heretofore been a stranger to our system of criminal law.

(5) This bill would make each county in which a lynching occurs or through which the party lynched has been transported by the mob, regardless of the knowledge of the county or its officers, and without regard as to how blameless the county may be, responsible in damages in the sum of $10,000 for each person so lynched or transported through such county. Such sum may be recovered on suit against the county by the Federal Government. The bill attempts to authorize a levy of execution "on any property of the county to satisfy such sum." Under the terms of this bill, if held constitutional, the Federal Government might sell the courthouse of a county in satisfaction of such a judgment.

The $10,000 so recovered is to be paid to the family of the person lynched. Thus, under these provisions, we see the innocent, law-abiding people of a community mulcted for $10,000 to be paid the relatives of the victim of the mob, regardless of the viciousness of the offense the lynched man has committed, regardless of his value to his surviving relatives, and regardless of the worth or character of such relatives.

This $10,000 penalty is exacted, not of the guilty lynchers, but of the innocent taxpayers of the county. It is, in substance, a guaranty or an insurance policy in favor of every person in the Nation for $10,000, payable in case he is lynched, provided he was lynched "as a punishment for or to prevent some actual or supposed public offense." The insurance is not payable if he is unquestionably the innocent victim of a mob and not connected with any actual or supposed crime.

No human government has ever heretofore reached that stage of efficiency in the enforcement of preventive criminal law when it could give a financial guaranty to its citizens against the criminal acts of wrongdoers. It would seem if we desire to embark upon such a scheme of crime insurance, we should begin by writing our policies in favor of innocent victims rather than in favor of those whose own repulsive crimes provoke mob violence. The orphan child and the widowed mother, dependents of innocent victims of mobs and other vicious crimes, should make a stronger appeal to our humanity and sense of justice than the relatives of victims who are usually perpetrators of vicious crimes.

Lynching is a crime under the law of every State in the Union. No system of criminal law in any State recognizes the justice or right of the mob to take a human life. The only necessity urged for this bill is the claim that the Federal Government will more effectively than the States prosecute lynchers. Local sentiment, it is charged, sympathizes with or condones the mob, rendering State prosecutions impossible or ineffective. Therefore import prosecutors and export the accused for trial.

In other words, the demand for this bill proceeds on the theory that the Federal Government shall be the censor of State conduct; that the Federal Government, with the superior virtue of a superman, shall approve what is good in the State government, condemn what is bad, and stand like a colossus with a club over the State, punishing it when it fails to meet the standards of virtue prescribed by the Federal Government. Not only does this bill threaten to punish State officials from governor to constable, who fail to perform their State duties as determined by the Federal Government, but it also holds subdivisions of the State liable to penalties, regardless of their knowledge or participation in any wrongdoing. This is an impossible conception of the relations of our Federal to our State Governments. A Federal Government that can command and penalize officers and subdivisions of the State can tyrannize over and destroy the liberty of the State government and its people.

The courts of the United States are inadequate to handle general criminal cases. The court system of the United States was never designed to take over the enforcement of domestic crimes generally. There are only 86 district courts in the United States.

These courts, comparatively few in number, are largely located remotely from vast numbers of our population. The Federal Government has neither the jails nor a number of officers sufficient or intended to provide the machinery for enforcing generally the criminal law. For nearly a thousand years Anglo-Saxons have believed that the accused is entitled to a jury trial in the county where the crime is alleged to have been committed and where his witnesses are available.

The constitutions of most States guarantee that right and prohibit the trial elsewhere, except by consent of the accused. For over eight centuries the establishment of this right has been haled as one of the greatest triumphs in the struggle of men for liberty and justice. This bill in substance discards that rule of just procedure. It proposes going back to the old system of tyranny in ancient days when men were dragged from their homes to remote places for trial, away from their acquaintances and friends, and largely deprived of the benefit of favorable witnesses.

The State criminal-law system has provided more than 3,000 courts, distributed over the United States, where men are properly tried for domestic offenses near the places where the offenses are committed. It is to these State courts we should leave the prosecution of the offenses defined by this bill.

As a precedent this bill is bad. A power that can be employed by the Federal Government for the punishment of one kind of mob violence to-day can be exerted for another to-morrow. The power that usurps a State function as to one crime can be applied to many and to all crimes.

It does not qualify or mitigate the viciousness of the principle embodied in this legislation that it is invoked for a purpose that may appear humane or just. All encroachments upon the liberties and rights of men have been made under a pretense of serving the higher good. A wrong thing done for a good purpose can have no sanction of law. It is based upon the same theory upon which the mob defies law.

In assigning separate functions to the two great sovereignties of our Government, the Nation and the State, it was not intended that one should be the censor of the other. The power to define and punish crimes reserved to the State included the power to act unwisely as well as wisely. If the right of the State to perform its functions is dependent on whether or not in the opinion of the Federal Government such functions are wisely or unwisely, successfully or unsuccessfully, performed, then the original reservation of such power to the State is a mere nullity—a form without substance.

This legislation is proposed primarily as a plea in behalf of the colored man. It is legislation that involves race prejudice and the tendency of which, if enacted, will be to accentuate race prejudice. To a considerable extent its enactment would be accepted by a large portion of the colored people of the Nation as a threat or punishment directed at the white people of the South by the people of the other sections of the country. In this situation colored people of criminal inclinations are likely to find an incentive and a license to commit offenses that they did not feel before.

The people of no State in the Nation are predominantly criminal or unjust. One State may travel the road of progress more slowly and falteringly than another, but no intelligent well-wisher of the future of the Republic would for that reason suggest that such faltering State should be deprived of its functions.

The large population of colored people in the South have given the white people of that section one of the most trying problems ever presented to the white race. It is the peculiar problem of the South. Officious interference by the Federal Government and other States will only accentuate the problem without contributing to its solution.

The lynching problem is not alone the problem of the South. Since 1885 lynchings have occurred in each of the 48 States of the Union, with six exceptions.

In the 32 years from 1889 to 1920, inclusive, 3,095 persons were lynched in the United States. The average number lynched per year for the first 16 years of this period was over 128. The average number lynched per year for the last 16 years was less than 65. The largest number lynched in any one year during the last 16 years was 83, while the largest number lynched in one year of the preceding 16-year period was 208, in the year 1892. Thus 30 years ago we passed the peak of the lynching period. Gradually the States, supported by public sentiment, have improved conditions. We have made substantially a 50 per cent progress toward eliminating lynching in the last 20 years. Ten Houses of Congress have come and gone. The pressing need for this legislation, if it ever existed, has largely passed away.

If it is desired to superimpose the Federal Government on the States in the enforcement of the criminal law, other fields of criminality now make a much stronger appeal. The Judiciary Committee recently reported to the House that during the last 10 years, while lynchings have been decreasing, "criminal business in the United States district courts has increased over 800 per cent." On the 1st day of last July 55,769 criminal cases were pending in the United States district courts. Over 9,000 homicides per year are now being committed in the United States. A wave of murder, highway robbery, and grosser crimes is sweeping over the country. The percentage of such crimes in our land is far beyond that of other civilized countries. Our States are failing unquestionably and ignobly to give that security of human life that is the ideal and aim of government. If the remedy for State failure is Federal interference and a duplication of State crimes by Federal statutes, then the method of this bill points to the remedy for our appalling record of crime. But no man is so foolish to suggest that such is the remedy. Neither is it the remedy for lynchings. The remedy for State failure is not Federal interference but State improvement.

In voting against this bill I have no thought that its defeat would retard the progress of the colored man or deny him justice. The race sensitiveness exists. It is not the creature of law, nor can it be eliminated by law. The black man has the same right to justice as the white man. The distinctions of race that separate him from his white neighbors can not be wiped away by decree of Congress. If that could be done, the problem would be easy. In the struggle of peoples the black man has been the white man's victim and the white man has also been his savior. The rights and opportunities of the black man should be protected by law, but his progress and advancement can have no other secure foundation than his own moral worth. That is the means of progress within his own hands. It is the natural way and his only sure way.

Too much of the interest of outside people in the problems of the colored man in the South has been in ignorance of the problem or inspired by political motives. Unfortunately, ever since the Civil War both the North and South have been pestered by demagogic politicians, whose selfish interests have been served by promoting racial and sectional hatreds. Energies and abilities that should have been exercised to promote progress and harmony have been prostituted to the propagation of racial and seditional hatreds for political purposes. The poor colored man has been on the nether side of this situation. The ignorant colored man has been the victim and the pawn of these demagogues. To the extent that this bill serves such purposes, it is wholly vicious.

Those truly interested in the welfare of the colored race have abundant opportunity for the full bestowal of their efforts. Let them contribute to the improvement of the comfort, morals, education, and religious advancement of the colored people. Let their concern be primarily for the millions and millions of law-abiding, worthy colored people rather than inciting race prejudices in behalf of an infinitesimally small number of mob victims.

Only a little over 70 years from slavery, the colored people have made a progress that is commendable and challenges our admiration and sympathy. We can best promote their further progress by encouraging them still further along the path of patient industry, law obedience, and moral worth.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, this is a so-called anti-lynching bill. It is proposed to assess a fine of $10,000 against each county in which a lynching occurs, the money to be paid to the relatives of the person lynched. It is further proposed to punish the sheriff, deputy, marshal, or other arresting officer from whom the lynched person is taken by life imprisonment.

Will these things prevent lynchings? No. Lynchings can only be stopped in other ways. You can not stop lynchings by offering a reward to a person to go out and commit a crime which invites a lynching. This bill if passed will bring about more race hatred, more lynchings, and more race riots. I had intended to argue the legal propositions involved, but will not do that now. The question of the unconstitutionality of this act has been ably presented repeatedly by Members on this floor. Every phase has been fully covered. Every decision has been ably presented. I have no doubt that the bill is not constitutional. It is my purpose at this time to present some views I have, many of which have not heretofore been presented in the argument here. I am leaving unsaid many things I would like to say, but which have during the long hours of debate here been repeatedly said. I shall strive to add to what has already been said.

Mr. Chairman, Mr. DYER, the author of this bill, the other day on this floor said:

During the Civil War never was there a criticism of the conduct of any Negro man or woman who was in slavery.

This is true. No criticism was made of the Negroes of the South who were left with the wives and children of the white men. No outrages were committed by these colored men either during the Civil War or immediately after the war. This is to the everlasting honor of the Negroes of those days and of the influences then surrounding them. This was before the Negro was influenced by propaganda of those who do not understand him. This was before the introduction of this Dyer so-called antilynching bill and before the introduction of the Tinkham resolution, in the days when the Negro race considered it honorable to love and protect the women and children of the white men, when the Negro wanted no higher privilege than the privilege of being helpful and courteous to others, the most glorious privilege on earth when exercised properly and under proper circumstances.

Mr. Chairman, this was in the good old days when the Negro sought, found, and gladly exercised the privilege of being courteous and helpful to the white man and his folks and rejoiced in the grateful appreciation of the white folks.

Other influences, ofttimes sincere but more often sinister, have crept in, and now instead of appreciation and love of each other there is race hatred and bitterness. There are thousands, yea, millions, of Negroes yet in the South, under the influence of the good old Negro daddies and mammies of the old days, who are courteous and true to the white man and his family. There are a few—a very few, thank God—in the South and many in the North of the Negro race who have gotten the idea from somewhere that the white man is a thing to be hated; that it is degrading for the Negro race to be courteous, polite, and obliging to the white folks, and that the way for the Negro to make his way among the white race is for him to be offensive, discourteous, and to force himself in where he is not wanted as often as possible. What an awful indictment against the Negroes and whites everywhere who live by stirring up race prejudices and bitterness.

Mr. Chairman, if you would remove the greatest cause of the outrages by Negro men, of racial hatred, of lynchings, and of race riots, then remove or forever stop the mouths of Negro and white breeders of race hatred. Oh, that the Negro race would spew out of its mouth these carrion maggots who engender, create, and live on the stench of race hatred.

Mr. Chairman, you will agree with me that the best thing to be done is that thing which will cause the best feeling between the races.

The true test to be applied to every bill like the present one is, will the measure if enacted bring about a better feeling between the white men and the colored men? This is true of everything suggested in connection with the race question. Some one asked me what I thought of President Harding's Birmingham speech as touching the race question.

I said in reply:

If the speech caused a greater politeness, courtesy, respect, and love of the Negro for the white man and of the white man for the Negro, then the speech was a great success. But if the speech caused the Negro race to hate the white man more and the white man to hate the Negro more bitterly, and if it caused the Negroes of the country to crowd more women and children off the sidewalks and make themselves more offensive in every way and made the chasm of bitterness and hatred between the races deeper and wider, then the speech was a monumental and an awful blunder.

Lets build up a better feeling between the races, not a more bitter one.

Mr. Chairman, the white race will determine what position in this great civilization the Negro race shall occupy. This will eventually be determined not by sectional hatred—not by partisan prejudice and not by political selfish narrowness. The white race will write the verdict of the Negroes' rights in this Nation, and the white people of the South will help make, will agree to, and will approve the verdict. The verdict will be impartial. It will be fair. It will speak the truth. It will be made up, after a careful consideration of all the evidence submitted by the Negro race, in view of all the surrounding circumstances and under the laws of eternal fairness, justice, and right. The verdict will not be a directed verdict. It will not be a forced decision. The white race will decide what position the Negro is worthy to occupy from the Negro's own acts, from his merit or lack of merit, and not from demands made by Negro propagandists of either the Negro race or white race, except that these propagandists by the creation of racial hatred are introducing a mass of evidence against the colored race. I will say more along this line later.

The white man's verdict on the race question will not be made up by bills pushed through Congress, except this kind of thing hurts the Negro race. The verdict will not be made up favorably to the Negro by the Negro race forcibly exercising privileges contrary to the wishes of the white race. The Negro race suffers from this. It does not gain. If I had a case before 12 jurors I would, so far as possible, introduce my best evidence. I would not want to be obnoxious to the jurors. I would want to show them every possible courtesy. I would want to be polite to them. Some Negroes are handling the matter properly. Others are not. The Negroes of the South are making a better showing for the race than is being made by the Negroes of the North. The white race of the South is helping the Negro solve the problem. We would soon solve the race question in the South if we were only let alone by racial prejudice, vultures of other sections. The Negro of the South is very much more polite and respectful to the white race than are the northern Negroes. While the southern Negro as a rule is courteous and polite to the white man or woman, the northern Negro is arrogant, haughty, disrespectful, and insulting to the white man and his folks.

The Negroes of the South are working out their own salvation in this country; the northern Negro is working out his own condemnation. The time is fast approaching when the North will bitterly detest the whole Negro race. The worst Negroes of the South, if they miss the penitentiary, the gallows, and the occasional lynchings, are coming north to add to your already haughty, contemptible northern Negro population. This mixture of our worst with the northern bad Negro race will go on making themselves as obnoxious as possible to the white race. They will push you and your wives and children aside to get on street and railway cars first, and then take the best seats and slouch down on the seats, and force you and your loved ones to sit by them while they, in order to be sure they appear your equal, make themselves as offensive as possible. They will push you and your folks off the sidewalks, to show you that they have special rights and are exercising them. At the public parks and public gatherings they will be anxious to show the white man that they are his equal. They will be sure and get between you and the music, and stand if you are sitting. They will talk loudly and laugh boisterously while you are trying to hear, to show you they are exercising equal rights. They will puff their cigar smoke so you will get a full share, and they will spit so a little will come your way, so you will know they are exercising their rights. They will not dare sit together at the band concerts, they will mix as thoroughly as possible, so you will see they are there. As nearly as possible they will get one on each seat in the street and railway cars, to show you they are exercising their rights.

It does not differ how many seats are in your waiting rooms; they will, if possible, get a few on each seat, so you will have the pleasure of standing or sitting by them and knowing they are exercising their rights. What I am saying is the truth. I am describing the condition in Washington and the North where the Negro is to-day. I am not talking about the South now. On Christmas Eve night I was in that great, magnificent passenger waiting room here in Washington, the most magnificent waiting room in the world. There are many, many, most splendid seats. There were present about one-third enough people to fill all the seats, and yet, upon careful observation, I found a few Negroes on every seat in that great waiting room. Not a single seat left where a white woman or child could sit without being side by side with a Negro. Yes, plenty of room, but no room where there were no Negroes. The Negroes of Washington and the North are determined to force themselves in as the equal of the white man. The so-called educated Negro is the most obnoxious of all. He thinks he knows how to swagger and not give an inch to any human being that is white. He thinks that to be courteous to a white person is to admit that he is not the white man's equal, and he must never do that.

The white people of the North will before long get the idea that there are no good Negroes; no, not one. The northern Negro and the mean southern Negro who comes North will expect political equality, economic equality, and social equality. He is determined to push himself forward in these respects every time he can, and if he gains an inch he will swagger over it and make his colored brethren hate the white man all the more. The northern Negro believes he is given a greater freedom with the white women up here. If he commits rape he expects the father and brothers, relatives, and neighbors of the outraged girl to plead for his protection and beg for him to become a great hero and have a fair and impartial trial, with the outraged girl, if left alive, in court to testify and him to deny. He expects newspaper write-ups, and the folks, some saying, "The rapist, Mr. Jones, must be innocent," and bringing him flowers, and if convicted he expects executive clemency and probably a pardon, with an implied invitation to him and others of his kind to go and do likewise.

All the while the Negro will be working his own condemnation, for as surely as day follows night so surely will the misunderstandings, the discourtesies, the insults, the outrages, the growing race hatred finally break forth not only in St. Louis, Omaha, and Washington but all over the North, and the awful carnage of race riots will hold sway. Why can not the northern Negro see this and instead of being haughty, offensive, and discourteous to the white race be all that the southern Negro is in the way of respect, courtesy, and politeness to the white race? You agitators had better quit teaching race hatred and teach race respect and good will. You had better teach the Negro race to respect and love the white man instead of hating him. You had better plead for good will, which will protect your innocent women and children against riots, instead of worrying over the rapist. You had far better plead for separate passenger stations, separate passenger cars, separate seats on street cars, and separate space at band concerts, and every other arrangement which will lessen the friction between the races and bring about a better feeling.

In the South everything has been done that can be done to lessen the friction between the races. A few of the worst Negroes will be lynched. The Negro in the South who commits rape knows what is coming. He simply commits suicide, that is all. If something is not done, and that speedily, hundreds will be killed in the North for every one we lynch in the South. You simply can not start a race riot where Negroes are courteous and polite to the white folks. The white people will not stand for it.

When race hatred is fanned almost to an all consuming flame and some one or score of men say lets destroy the Negro section and dozens of men promptly say, "No; old Bill lives down there. Old Fanny, my good old cook is down there. The Negroes down there are the friends of the white people. They are polite and anxious to be our friends." No race riot takes place.

But, on the contrary, let every man in the crowd remember not a good Negro but a bad one, not a good deed but a bad one, not courtesy and politeness but disrespect and vicious conduct, and then hell breaks loose. The good Negroes are saving the Negro race, the bad ones are destroying it. Why do not we worry about the good ones and not so much about the criminal and the rapist?

Mr. Chairman, now this bill is offered as a solution in part of the race question. Would it not be better for us to legislate for the innocent Negro women, children, and men rather than for the rapist and the vile criminal? Why not legislate for the protection of innocence and virtue instead of for the protection of the criminal and the defiler?

Mr. Chairman, why do some people concern themselves so much about the protection of the vile criminal and care so little or nothing about the welfare of innocent women and children? But, Mr. Chairman, I have never seen a buzzard turn from his filth and his carrion to enjoy the fragrance of the rose or to sip the sweetness of the honeysuckle. I have never seen the driver of a garbage wagon giving flowers to children or drinking in the beauties of the sky and earth. And, Mr. Chairman, I have never seen the man who is so concerned about the vilest of criminals bestir himself much for the cause of innocence, purity, and virtue. Let us strive to remove the cause of lynchings. We can stop them that way only. On the second day after I was sworn in as Congressman I used on this floor the following language:

> Sometimes the men of my State and of the South even go so far as to deal out, without trial, summary punishment to the individual who does a serious injury to one of our daughters.
> It is true they go beyond the law and become criminals themselves to avenge the wrong. Life becomes unbearable to the man whose daughter or neighbor's daughter has been outraged so long as there breathes the one who wantonly committed the outrage. The father and his neighbors are pushed onward to vengeance by a never-ceasing, ever-increasing, irresistible agony of an outraged love which sweeps everything aside. There is no fear of law or death or hell. Vengeance is theirs, and the outrage of their loved one must be avenged. They are as helpless to turn aside from their mission of dealing out justice, without regard to law and order, as a handful of leaves of the forest would be of themselves to turn aside from the mighty rush of the Niagara.
> We do not sanction and approve the disregard of law. We must admire the great love of womanhood which prompts and compels the action.
> The women of my State, and I believe of all other States, fear no violence, unavenged, so long as there lives within our bounds the lover of a sweetheart, the brother of a sister, the husband of a wife, the father of a daughter, or the son of a mother.

Many believe that the way to lessen a crime is to make the punishment more speedy, sure, and terrible. The same sentiment or passion which causes men to lynch for an outrage of a woman is in the bosom of every man present. See if I am right about this. Even a dog on the street or out on the public road has not only the protection of the law, he has the protection of his owner who will fight for him, "It makes no difference if he is a houn'. They've got to quit kicking my dog aroun'."

Your little boy or girl has the protection of the law and in addition thereto the protection which exists when others know he is your child and that you will not only appeal to the law but will resent with your last drop of blood, if necessary, any indignity or abuse heaped upon that child. The girlhood and womanhood of the country have and should have not only the protection of the law but the protection of every drop of blood and ounce of flesh of every true man not only within sound of her voice but within the territory where true men hear of her mistreatment. What will we do in Georgia and in the South to protect our women? I will tell you. We will do just whatever is necessary. Some one inquired about two young women. The reply came, "One is the daughter of old Bill Pidgeon Liver. If you insult her, mistreat her in any way, seduce her, or rape her old Bill and her brothers and all their kin will not hold you to account personally. Oh, they may swear out a warrant and let you give bond and get off best you can." Then the question was repeated, "Who is the other girl?" The answer came clear and definite, "She is the daughter of Johnny Redblood. If you dare harm or insult her or mistreat her you will receive bitter, determined punishment at the hands of her father and brothers, even unto death, if necessary."

Whose child had you rather be? Who is the best citizen? Which brothers would be bravest and best on the field of battle for their country? You know. I know. Everybody knows.

Is there a man in Congress who will confess that regardless of what indignity and outrage may be heaped upon his wife, daughter, mother, or sister he would not personally resent the offense? No; there can be no such person. Then we all must have the same sentiment which ofttimes impels fathers, brothers, and others to dispatch promptly a guilty person who has outraged a loved one of theirs.

The people of the North can claim no more love for another race than can the people of the South. The Pilgrims of Massachusetts made the same war on King Philip and his Indian followers as did the people of Georgia and Florida on the Indian Osceola and his band, and as did the people of the Great Lakes region on the treacherous Pontiac and his braves. The people of the North loved the good Indians just as our ancestors in the South loved Tomochichi, the friend of Oglethorpe, Pushmataha, the great friend of the whites, and Sequoia, the Cadmus of his race, that noble Indian born in my State of Georgia, whose statue was placed yonder in Statuary Hall by the good State of Oklahoma.

"There is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so." Some men pretend that the safety of the Nation depends on the elimination of lynchings. There are a hundred ways in which our Government is being undermined more effectively than by the occasional lynching of some one who has disregarded all law. While we argue this bill there will be more men, women, and children hit, crushed, and killed by speeding auto violators of the law here in Washington alone than there are criminals lynched in the entire United States in a whole year. The children and people killed here every day are innocent. The person lynched is, as a rule, a criminal. The auto violator of the law has no excuse except the utter disregard of human life and law. He is a murderer at heart when he speeds through a crowded street, and yet practically no effort is made to punish him. If he is ever brought before some of the so-called judges here in the District, he is probably turned loose with the thanks of the court, and the man who arrested him is probably cussed out by the judge for pursuing him or using a little force to stop his murderous speed or for being not in full view of the speeder at the time the auto bandit was making a murderous assault on the common folks who walk. This is lynching of all law and order by the judiciary.

We ought to have a decent observance of traffic regulations here, or have a few hangings for murder and a chain gang full of men guilty of voluntary manslaughter and murder, or we ought to impeach some judges for lynching the law. There are so many things that worry me more than the occasional lynching of a criminal.

There are approximately 1,000 girls in this country each year who go away from home and are lost to father and mother and home, never to return, to each person lynched in this country. Why worry so much about the lynched brute when there are thousands of things more serious demanding our attention? Almost invariably when I find in a newspaper here in Washington a tirade against the lynching of some rapist in the country somewhere, I turn through that paper and find where the paper which is so concerned about the rapist has felt it a glorious opportunity to lynch in the presence of the populace some child who is accused of a petty larceny or other small offense. The lynched brute gets what he invited and what he deserves and is soon through the agony. The child is innocent of all crime except some childish indiscretion, and yet she is mentioned as pretty and young, her age being given, the little offense is described in exaggerated terms so as to attract attention to the write up, and her name and address are given so as to lynch her not for a day, not with a sudden death, but daily and continually, and for life. Better that she was burned and forgotten.

Mr. Chairman, I will support a bill to punish the big newspapers which persist in lynching children and women. I wonder if the passage of such a bill can be secured. These children that are lynched are poor children who need a good name as badly as the rich children, whose small offenses are not ordinarily chronicled. There are a million crimes, outrages, and horrible violations of the law for every lynching. Why worry so much about the minor offense? Surely those that are pushing this bill through Congress are about as wise and brilliant as the owner of a large cabbage plantation who went out and spent days worrying about five gnats which persisted in flying near and alighting on his cabbage and paid no attention to a thousand elephants which were destroying his entire cabbage field.

Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to provide, among other things, for the payment of $10,000 to the relatives of a lynched individual, the penalty to be paid by the county in which the lynching occurs. Let us see what is proposed here. All criminal statutes are designed for the protection of some class of individuals or for the protection of individuals in the enjoyment of certain rights. Who are to be protected under this bill? Is it for the protection of a citizen who quietly and peaceably is engaged in the daily avocation of life? No. Is it for the protection of the innocent in the enjoyment of any of the rights guaranteed by the fundamental laws of the land? No. Is it for the protection of any man, woman, or child anywhere in this country of ours in the legal possession of any right vouchsafed by the laws of either man or God? No. The bill is designed for the protection of the man who has disregarded all the laws of man and of God and committed the unspeakable crime and whose foul, vile black hands are dripping with innocent human blood. The bill is not for the protection of an innocent man, woman, or child. It is not for the protection of a law-abiding liberty-loving human being. But, Mr. Speaker, it is for the protection of the vilest, foulest, blackest beast out of the lower regions—the rapist.

Why, Mr. Chairman, should we provide $10,000 for the relatives of the rapist when he is killed by a justly infuriated community, when there is no provision to pay the relatives of the father who is killed by the highwayman? Why pay the relatives of the rapist when there is no law to pay the relatives of the innocent children whose lives are crushed out every day here in the very shadow of this Capitol by speeding autoists in utter disregard of law? Why should the rapist and his relatives become the special favorites of the Government and be given a status superior to the millions of other individuals who yearly lose their lives illegally? Why give to the rapist $10,000 insurance, payable to his heirs? This is better than we did for the boys who left their homes and went to the battle front to fight and to die. The soldiers had to pay for their insurance as a protection against the risk assumed. The rapist is, under this bill, to get free insurance against death because of the risk assumed.

Are we to pass a law saying to the criminally inclined, "Commit rape, then brutally slaughter your innocent victim, and this 'Land of the free and home of the brave' will stand sponsor for you, and if you are killed by those who are crushed and horrified by your act, then your relatives are to get what will be to them a magnificent fortune"?

Mr. Chairman, there are principles of equity which may be remembered just now and which are as follows: "He who seeks equity must do equity." "He who seeks equity must come with clean hands." We might here well add the following: He who seeks for himself the full protection of all the rights guaranteed by Constitution and all fundamental and statutory laws should not himself become the basest of all violators of all law and order. He who seeks the protection of the laws of man should not himself cease to be human and become worse than brute. Oh, what a farce is this bill, which seeks to make the base criminal and ofttimes the rapist the hero of law enforcement. You seek to make the rapist the mentor of human rights and liberties, and would make him the exemplar of constitutional rights and law enforcement. You would make him a messenger, a precursor, a forerunner, a harbinger of that better, brighter, and more glorious civilization which is yet to dawn and usher in the flood tide of human greatness.

Oh, what a farce is the bill and the very idea of its enactment. Let us put forth every effort to solve the race question and not make it more complex.

Mr. Chairman, are we solving the race or Negro question or is this question solving itself? I believe the question is solving itself. The Negro race is working out its own salvation and greatness or its own condemnation and failure. Just as an individual can gain friends by becoming worthy of friends, so can a race attain a high position in the world by becoming worthy of that position and as an individual can destroy himself by failure to respect the rights of others, so does a race destroy itself by failure to respect and safeguard the rights of other people and races.

So it is with the Negro race. An individual may for a while occupy a position in the minds of those who know him, either higher or lower than he is entitled to, but he will eventually find his proper level. The Negro race will find the level it is entitled to occupy. A piece of cork and a piece of lead held by a hand under the water remain together, but when released one floats, the other sinks. The white and black race may be held together by political exigencies or sectional hatred or one race by these causes may be placed higher than the other, but when sectional hatred is swept away, and both races are left free to sink or swim on merit then each will find its true level. The Negro race is left in this great civilzation—the product of the white man's brain and the Negro race will find and occupy eventually the position it is entitled to occupy. This is a white man's glorious civilization and a white man's grand and magnificent form of Government. The Negro never helped to build either. They were thrust upon him without his adding a single jot or tittle anywhere. He has done nothing that would not have been done by the white man. What is the Negro's true position? The white man is willing to give the Negro a fair deal and accord him his true position in this country. This is true in the North. It is likewise true in the South. The greatest trouble now is, that some sections do not yet understand the Negro as well as he is understood in the South. I believe the people of the South are to-day the Negro's best friends. We give them the same government and laws we enjoy. We give them the equal protection of the law. We detest and abhor the vile criminal beast of the Negro race. We accord a square deal and fair treatment to the thoughtless and average criminal class of Negroes. We give our good will and hearty support to the Negro who is striving to make good and who is honorable in his dealings.

We respect, we love, we reverence the good old Negro man and woman who respect, love, and reverence the white man and his loved ones. Oh, yes; the Negro gets a fair deal in the South. The Negro race can never build for itself a better future by pushing the Negro in where the white man should be. Legislation forced on the white people of the South by Negroes of the North and by those who desire to please the Negroes of the North does not and can not help the Negro race. It only widens the breach and does damage.

The Negroes of the South would be a contented people ordinarily except for the bitterness stirred up by northern Negroes and white propagandists who really care nothing for the southern Negro. Practically all the fight from the Negro race for this so-called antilynching bill is from Negroes from Boston, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Chicago, and other northern points. I attended all the committee hearings on the investigation of the Ku Klux, and there were several Negroes there scared to death of the Ku Klux, and every one of them was styled doctors or professors and were from some northern city. Why are the Negroes of St. Louis, Chicago, and Boston so afraid of lynchings and so afraid of the Ku Klux? Do not the Northern States give protection to the Negroes? Oh, some one says that the northern Negro is trying to help the southern Negro. I deny this charge. The northern Negro propagandists are helping the northern Negro to the detriment of the southern Negro and to the detriment of the white race. The northern Negro is stirring up all the race hatred possible, so he can fleece the innocent, unsuspecting darkey and make him believe he is making a fight to save him from a dire calamity and to make him the equal of the white man. The northern Negroes have an equal rights league or organization. God Almighty never made the Negro the white man's equal, and I am sure no Boston or Chicago Negro can make the Negro the white man's equal. No set of men, white or black, can do so. You had as well try to shoot the moon out of the sky with a popgun as to try to undo the race limitations fixed by the Creator. If the northern Negro loves the Negro race so well, and is doing an unselfish work, why do not these Boston and Chicago Negro strife makers go to Africa and tell of this civilization to their forefathers, the African savages in their jungle home. The white men came to this wilderness, wrought a great empire in spite of adversity. Why do not these Negroes of the North, who style themselves doctor and professor, go to the wilderness of that great continent and build a great Negro empire and a great civilization instead of staying here and instilling in the Negroes of this country hatred of the race that brought the Negro out of darkness and gave him the best civilization and Government the world ever saw. The white civilization is thousands of years ahead of the Negro civilization of Africa. Suppose the white man could get up to some of the planets in the sky and find a civilization there thousands of years ahead of ours. What would those white men do? They would be glad to get back to the earth to tell of the wonderful civilization found up there beyond the sky.

Not so with the Negro of the North. He cares for no other Negro except in so far as he can use him. He stirs up bitterness and causes the Negroes' lot to be more difficult. The Boston and Chigaco equal-rights Negro is the breeder of lynchings and mob violence, and now they have a great bill to pay $10,000 to a Negro who commits suicide by causing a lynching. The way to stop lynchings is to remove the cause. You can not stop lynchings by law as long as the cause of lynchings is prevalent. You had as well try to spit on the sun and put it out as to try to stop lynchings by a law that does not endeavor to remove the cause of lynchings.

You northern Negroes quit howling about lynchings and begin preaching against rape. Preach more of the shortcomings of the Negro and less of the white man's errors. Make war on rape and all forms of crime. Do not leave the white race to wage all the war. The rapist needs not the protection of either race. The rapist outrages all law, and, brute that he is, not only voluntarily makes his own violent death inevitable at once, but stirs up a race hatred that may mean the immediate death of not only his own relatives but of scores of others. Why should anyone worry about his welfare?

Mr. Chairman, instead of taking up time with this bill, we better be trying to find the relative rights of each and bring about a better understanding. The Negro can not be the equal of the white man socially, economically, or politically. This is a white man's civilization and a white man's Government, and the white man is and will remain supreme. The Negro race can be and should be happy, contented, prosperous, law-abiding, and very helpful to his community and to his Nation. He can best be this keeping in mind his obligations to the white race and recognizing the true position of himself and of the white man.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, when God created the heavens and the earth and the fullness thereof and thought of suns, planets, stars and satellites, and they rolled from His finger tips and took their places in the broad expanse of space, and said, "Let there be light," and there was light, and viewing the end with the beginning, saw all that has ever come to pass and all the future and knew of the future progress of humanity before the birth of the race, He was well pleased, and yet His supreme creative work had not yet been done. He took the dust of the earth and molded it into His own image, into the form of a man and breathed into its nostrils His own creative, everlasting, immortal breath, and the image came forth a human being, a living soul, all dominating, all conquering, everlasting, eternal, immortal; a part of God Himself; a Caucasian, a white man, and God gave that first white man dominion over all things, and told him to reach to the bottom of the sea and up to the highest skies and understand and know the mysteries of all time and space, and that first man, a white man, went forth to solve, understand, conquer, and know the universe in which he had been placed. And that first white man from that day to this has been the all-powerful, all-controlling, all-dominating man of the world. He has conquered the depths of the sea; he has flown like a bird through the very gates of the skies; he has whispered around the world in the twilight of a new era; he has weighed the moon, the earth, and the sun; he is solving and knowing and bringing under his subjection and dominion all the mysteries of life, of space, and of all the universe of God, and as time goes by he is learning to think, understand, and know the thoughts of the Almighty God of the skies.

Commissioned by the Great Creator, he is the governing power of the world and is gradually shaping the nations of this earth into the highest and best forms of government, and is the ruler, and the supreme power of all other races, whether the yellow, the red, or the black. He is the all-controlling, all-powerful, all-dominating man of the world. He always has been and always will be, to the end of time.

Forces of nature may oppose him, but he overcomes them. Other peoples, races, and colors of humanity may resist him, but of no avail, he marches onward conquering and holding his God-given supremacy. Mr. Speaker, the sooner an individual learns his relation to the rest of mankind the better for that individual and for humanity, and the sooner the colored or Negro race learns its true relation to the rest of the world, and especially to the white race, the better for both races. Nothing could help so much in the solution of the race question as for the white race, not only of the South but of the North, East, and West, to know, realize, and assert, once and for all, the absolute supremacy of the white man.

By white supremacy I do not mean white oppression. I do mean, though, that this is a white man's Nation and a white man's world. The white man by nature and by God's eternal plan is the supreme man and is the governing, dominating force of the world. The powerful should always be fair, and the white race being the supreme race should be fair in its dealings with all men of all races. The white race is the supreme race, the God-like race, and should be as just in its dealings with the inferior races and peoples as God himself is just.

Mr. Chairman, in the South we are not trying to make the Negro our equal. We could not do this if we tried. We would only injure the Negro and not help him. We are ofttimes forced to use extreme measures with the Negro. This is caused by the Negro getting the wrong idea of his relation to the white man. He gets this erroneous idea from improper propaganda generally originating in sections other than the South. The man who does not know the darkey and who would help him by persuading him that he is the equal of the white man works the destruction of the Negro race.

This whole race question will be solved, and the probability of lynchings and race riots will be greatly lessened, if not eliminated, when the white race everywhere asserts its supremacy to all races and its fairness to all races.

This is in accordance with God's great plan, and the plan is as inflexible as God himself. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, there is one thing that has been developed in this debate and that is the unanimity with which all reprobate lynching and revere the Constitution. If I had time, I should like to add a word, a few burning words, against the heinous crime of lynching. It is indefensible. I join in the general abhorrence that has been expressed in this body against this savage, this inhuman crime. But because I abhor that crime, and because I think that the great body of our citizens who are crying out against this crime and demanding some protection are entitled to real protection, I am unwilling to subscribe to every half-baked measure aimed against lynching that may be disgorged from the Committee on the Judiciary.

This great body of our citizens is entitled to real and actual and substantial legislative protection. I am not willing to subscribe in toto to this bill, because I feel that it is an idle, vain, illusory, and nugatory measure. It is a measure that ignores and defies the repeated decisions of the Supreme Court, the repeated statements of the great text-writers who have specialized upon this fourteenth amendment, and unless this bill is amended I am unwilling to subscribe to the legislative chicanery, camouflage, deception, and duplicity that it now embodies.

The Republican platform in no place declared for this bill. The Republican platform reprobated lynching, and the President of the United States asked us to secure the appointment of a commission to determine how far Congress was entitled to go under the Constitution in order to suppress this abhorrent crime. For that reason, and for the reason that these men, this great body of our citizens, are entitled to real, actual, substantial, valid, and constitutional legislation, I wish to leave a few thoughts with the committee this afternoon.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] said the other day, "Why not leave it up to the Supreme Court to decide?"

I do not look with favor upon such a proposition. The Supreme Court has already given us guides. I do not think such a proposition comports with the duty that we owe to the House and the duty that we owe to the country. I believe it is my duty to give to this House and to the country and to the great body of citizens demanding redress from lynching my best thought and my best consideration as to what is a valid measure under the Constitution looking toward the suppression of lynching.

I have not the time now to discuss the large number of decisions on the fourteenth amendment. They have been presented to you by various Members of the House. Again, it seems to me that in a mixed body, such as we have here, composed of both laymen and lawyers, decisions are more or less confusing and misleading. They contain, as Blackstone says, "subtle disquisitions and metaphysical refinements that work to great confusion of the lay gents." I think I can be helpful and best serve the interests of this body by reading from the great authors who have specialized on the fourteenth amendment and who have written textbooks upon that fourteenth amendment. They give us a reliable, impartial, and easily understood exposition of the decisions of the Supreme Court.

They invariably lay down the proposition that the fourteenth amendment can not be invoked to suppress the lawless acts of private individuals. That proposition is laid down by every text-writer. It is laid down by every legal encyclopedia. It is laid down by every writer who has annotated our Federal Code or our Federal Constitution.

The first authority I shall read from is Guthrie upon the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, the very authority which the chairman of the committee a few moments ago quoted from. On page 42 of his Fourteenth Amendment, Guthrie says:

While the application of the fourteenth amendment is universal and protects the individual from an arbitrary exercise of power by State authority, whether it be the legislature, the executive, or the judicial branch of State government, it must be borne in mind that the Federal courts can not supervise or interfere with the internal affairs of a State unless some constitutional right has been invaded by State authority. The wrongful actions of individuals, unsupported by such authority, are not to be redressed under this amendment. They constitute merely private wrongs or crimes of the individual. The denial of a constitutional right must rest upon some State law or State authority for its excuse or perpetration if the fourteenth amendment is to furnish any remedy. Nor is the hardship or injustice of State laws necessarily an objection to their constitutional validity. The Federal courts should not be driven into perplexing inquiries as to the expediency or policy of State laws—inquiries which are usually unfit and improper for the judicial department. They will not permit themselves to be made harbors in which the people are to find a refuge from ill-advised and oppressive State statutes which do not infringe or deny constitutional guaranties. The remedy for evils of that character is to be sought in the State legislatures or at the ballot box—not in the Federal courts. "The rule, briefly stated, is that whenever an act of the legislature is challenged in court the inquiry is limited to the question of power, and does not extend to the matter of expediency, the motives of the legislators, or the reasons which were spread before them to induce the passage of the act. This principle rests upon the independence of the legislature as one of the coordinate departments of the Government. It would not be seemly for either of the three departments to be instituting an inquiry as to whether another acted wisely, intelligently, or corruptly."

You will find every one of these authorities laying down the same doctrine—that the fourteenth amendment can not be invoked to suppress the lawless acts of private individuals. At this point, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD. I shall print extracts from the textbooks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend and revise his remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have not the time to yield. I am sorry. I shall probably not be able to complete my remarks as it is. I read:

COLLINS "THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT AND THE STATES." (1912.)

As a consequence the relationship of Congress to the amendment has been for a long time clearly understood. It may be summed up as follows: The first section of the amendment is a prohibitory measure, and the prohibitions therein expressed operate against the States only. They bear no relationship to the acts of private persons within the States. (P. 67.)

So far as the fourteenth amendment is concerned, the Federal Government would be powerless to prevent armed mobs of whites from driving Negroes out from a State or otherwise threatening or intimidating them in their attempt to exercise the privileges of citizenship. (P. 68.)

BRANNON "THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT." (1901 EDITION.)

To whom it applies: The amendment applies only to State governmental action. Its first section does not operate upon the Federal Government, but on that of the States it does; nor does it have any reference to action or conduct of individual to individual. That it is a restraint upon State action is very obvious from its words, they being words of explicit prohibition. "No State shall" do the things prohibited. And section 5 gives Congress power to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation. And the Constitution of the United States is the highest law of the land. Thus it is undeniable that the Federal Government can and should, under this amendment, in proper cases, use all its machinery for the vindication of the rights by it sought to be protected. (P. 46.)

Another sound reason given by the court in the Civil Rights cases why the privileges there involved did not fall under the fourteenth amendment is that the amendment only deals with State action, not individual action, and the denial of admission by a hotel keeper or owner of a conveyance or theater is an individual act. And would not the police power of the State in such case forbid the Federal statute? (P. 86.)

At the threshold of the discussion of the clauses of the fourteenth amendment touching these subjects it is proper to say that it is no matter by what proceeding or in what manner the State deprives the person of life, liberty, or property, or denies him the equal protection of the law, without due process of law, whether by legislation or judicial decision, or by what officer or agent or agency, so it be by State authority or by any subordinate division, as by municipal corporation, the result is the same and is equally prohibited. But it is only the State that is prohibited, not individual action. It does not touch individual action. (P. 97.)

It is hardly necessary to say again that the amendment does not touch the case of the individual or mob murder, as it deals not with acts of individuals but only with action by the State through its constituted authorities. Such murders by individuals or mobs are to be dealt with only by the States. (P. 108.)

Wrong by individuals: This clause of equal protection has no application to wrong done by one individual to another. The trespasser or murderer is only the individual trespasser or murderer, acting in his own wrong, not for the State but against the will of the State, and the amendment does not touch his wrong, as it deals only with action by the State. (P. 330.)

The author, referring to the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3), states:

"In that case an act of Congress was held void and not warranted by the fourteenth amendment, because 'it stepped into the domain of local jurisprudence and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society toward each other and imposes sanctions for the enforcement of those rules, without referring to any supposed action of the State or its authorities.' If this legislation is appropriate for the enforcement of the prohibition of the amendment, it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress with equal show of authority enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property? If it is supposable that States may deprive persons of life, liberty, or property without the process of law—and the amendment itself does suppose this—why should not Congress proceed at once to prescribe due process of law for the protection of every one of these fundamental rights in every possible case, as well as prescribe equal privileges in inns, public conveyances, and theaters? The truth is that the implication of a power to legislate in this manner is based on the assumption that if the States are forbidden to legislate or act in a particular way and power is conferred on Congress to enforce the prohibition, this gives Congress power to legislate generally on that subject and not merely power to provide modes of redress against such legislation or action. The assumption is certainly unsound. It is repugnant to the tenth amendment, which declares that 'powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.'" (See Justice Field's opinion in Ex parte Virginia.)

Again referring to the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S.), the author, on page 454, states:

"Justice Bradley delivered a very able opinion, the effect of which is that it is State action of a particular character that is prohibited by the amendment, individual invasion of individual rights not being the subject matter of the amendment."

* * * * * * *

It may cast light upon the proper construction of the fifth section of the amendment to say that when that amendment was proposed in Congress a clause was proposed reading thus: "Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States and to all persons in the several States equal protection in the rights of life, liberty, and property." It was rejected. That rejection sheds light on the meaning of what was adopted. Had that clause been adopted, the amendment would mean more than it does. It would have given Congress power to do what the Supreme Court in all civil rights cases says it has no right to do. It would have given Congress power of affirmative legislation, such as it has in regard to commerce, to make laws, original power to make laws touching rights which the people of the States have, under State laws, covering immunities, privileges, life, liberty, property, and equality; in short, to make a code of regulation, of governing law, as to these matters, which, as Justice Bradley in those cases said, cover everything of value which man has; but, as adopted, the powers of Congress under the amendment are only vetoing, corrective, restricting, nullifying bad laws and action of the States denying those rights (p. 460).

FEDERAL STATUTES ANNOTATED.

Page 582, paragraph 5, referring to the fourteenth amendment, states:

"Not against wrongful action of individuals: Civil rights, such as are guaranteed by the Constitution against State aggression, can not be impaired by the wrongful acts of individuals unsupported by State authority in the shape of laws, customs, or judicial or executive proceedings. The wrongful act of an individual, unsupported by any such authority, is simply a private wrong, or a crime of that individual; an invasion of the rights of the injured party, it is true, whether they affect his person, his property, or his reputation; but if not sanctioned in some way by the State, or not done under State authority, his rights remain in full force, and may presumably be vindicated by resort to the laws of the State for redress. Hence, in all those cases where the Constitution seeks to protect the rights of the citizen against discriminative and unjust laws of the State by prohibiting such laws, it is not individual offenses, but abrogation and denial of rights, which it denounces, and for which it clothes the Congress with power to provide a remedy. This abrogation and denial of rights, for which the States alone were or could be responsible, was the great seminal and fundamental wrong which was intended to be remedied. And the remedy to be provided must necessarily be predicated upon that wrong. It must assume that in the cases provided for the evil or wrong actually committed rests upon some State law or State authority for its excuse and perpetration.

Page 634, referring to the fourteenth amendment, says:

"That this amendment is a prohibition on all State agencies, whether legislative, judicial, or executive, and is not directed against the action of individuals * * *."

Page 919, treating on the last paragraph of the first section of article 14, which is as follows: "Nor (shall any State) deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," it is stated:

"That this amendment is a prohibition on all State agencies, whether legislative, judicial, or executive, and is not directed against the action of individuals * * *."

This bill violates every doctrine announced in these textbooks when it seeks to punish the acts of lawless individuals. In that connection I desire to call to the attention of the House the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] on yesterday. I think the gentleman from Ohio was led into an error by the letter of the Attorney General to the Judiciary Committee. The letter of the Attorney General to the committee quotes from the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., p. 23), and the gentleman from Ohio read the same quotation, which is as follows:

Many wrongs may be obnoxious to the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment which are not, in any just sense, incidents or elements of slavery. Such, for example, would be the taking of private property without due process of law, or allowing persons who have committed crimes (horse stealing, for example) to be seized and hung by the posse comitatus without regular trial, or denying to any person, or class of persons, the right to pursue any peaceful avocations allowed to others.

The gentleman from Ohio quoted that. Then he said:

If the seizing and hanging of a horse thief is obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment, is there not a basis for legislation such as is here proposed?

The trouble with the Attorney General and the trouble with the gentleman from Ohio is that they did not read far enough in that decision, because the very next sentence of Judge Bradley is this:

What would be called class legislation would belong to this category and would be obnoxious to the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment.

Judge Bradley was not talking about these individual offenses. He was talking about class legislation of the States that would have permitted such an offense.

I desire also to call the attention of the House to the case that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] adverted to, and that is the Powell case (212 U. S., 564). That is a most important case, because it represents the very latest decision of the Supreme Court upon a statute not different in principle from the bill before us. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the chairman of the committee, tells us in effect that if those who passed the statute under which Powell and Riggins had been indicted had labeled that statute "A denial by the State of the equal protection of the laws," then that statute would have been upheld. That was the effect of his argument.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I can not yield. I will develop that idea. He says in effect that if you will declare the commission of the acts interdicted in that statute as "the denial of the equal protection of the laws" that then you have an act within the purview of the Constitution. The words "the denial of the equal protection of the laws" will supply the "open sesame" that will open the doors of the Constitution to the protection desired.

Let us examine into this Powell case and see what the Supreme Court held. The Powell case was a case where a man named Powell and a man named Riggins were indicted, under statutes (R. S., 5508 and 5509) almost identical in principle with the bill under consideration, and based on the fourteenth amendment, for taking with other persons a prisoner from the custody of the sheriff and lynching him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman give me about 10 minutes?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman seven minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon is recognized for seven minutes more.

Mr. SINNOTT. Riggins secured a severance. His attorneys applied to Judge Jones, of the United States Circuit Court of Alabama, for a writ of habeas corpus. Judge Jones denied the writ of habeas corpus and held that the fourteenth amendment covered the acts of private lawless individuals. Then his attorneys appealed to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court dismissed the appeal without prejudice, on the ground that habeas corpus was not the proper remedy.

In the meantime the Supreme Court of the United States decided the case of Hodges v. the United States (203 U. S., p. 1), involving the lawless acts of private individuals, in which they held—

That prior to the three post bellum amendments to the Constitution the National Government had no jurisdiction over a wrong like that charged in this indictment is conceded.

The court said:

That the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments do not justify the legislation is also beyond dispute, for they, as repeatedly held, are restrictions upon State action, and no action on the part of the State is complained of.

Now, the Powell case, the codefendant with Riggins, was before Judge Jones. The attorney for Powell sued out a writ of habeas corpus. After the decision in the Hodges case Judge Jones was doubtful as to whether or not the Hodges case should be applied to the Powell case. The attorneys for the Government in the Powell case contended that the quotation from the Hodges case was mere obiter dicta, and that it should not be the principle upon which to decide the Powell case. Judge Jones decided that the Supreme Court meant to say that the fourteenth amendment could not be invoked to suppress the lawless acts of private individuals, reversing his former decision in the Riggins case. He decided that way because he said:

If I make a mistake against the Government, it can appeal; no one will be injured. If I make a mistake against the defendant, an irreparable damage will be done to him.

Then the Powell case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, appealed by the Government. The attorneys for the Government set forth in the record the decision of Judge Jones in the Powell case. While Judge Jones decided in the Powell case against the application of the fourteenth amendment to private lawless acts, he proceeded to restate the reasons why he decided the other way in the Riggins case. He restated his reasons in a most powerful, persuasive way, doubtless having in mind that the Supreme Court would be more or less influenced by his restatement of his reasons in the Riggins case and reverse its former holdings and reinstate his original decision in the Riggins case. That powerful opinion of Judge Jones was printed in the record before the Supreme Court. Not only that, Attorney General Bonaparte and his assistants made a wonderfully powerful and eloquent argument in their brief. I shall print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD excerpts from this brief and from Judge Jones's decision. You will find in them every argument that has been advanced in support of this bill from the floor of this House since the consideration of this bill began. Yet, in spite of those arguments, the Supreme Court reiterated its oft-repeated position and held that the fourteenth amendment could not be invoked for the prevention of lawless acts of private individuals.

Not only that, but the Attorney General of the United States filed an able and vigorous petition for a rehearing, in which the matter was reargued again. In spite of that the Supreme Court again reiterated its original position and dismissed the charges against Powell. In the face of this we are asked to trifle and gamble with the Supreme Court.

How much more time can the gentleman give me?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is all I can give the gentleman.

Mr. SINNOTT. In these four minutes, gentlemen, I shall present some of the arguments advanced by Attorney General Bonaparte to show why he could invoke the fourteenth amendment against the lawless acts of private individuals. Referring to the deductions to be drawn from the decisions of the Supreme Court in other cases, he says:

They conclusively establish the contention that the United States is not confined to merely antagonizing and nullifying State action, but may and should actively participate in enforcing the guaranties embodied in this amendment.

Another argument he made was:

While these clauses express prohibitions against the States, yet these prohibitions are for the benefit of the individuals, who are within the jurisdiction of the States. Indeed, this amendment was adopted solely for the benefit of individuals; and we submit, therefore, that in some of the above-cited decisions, and especially, in the dicta contained therein, emphasis was improperly laid upon the rights of the States as opposed to the rights of the individuals subject to their laws (p. 43).

That argument was rejected. Again the Attorney General says, referring to the fourteenth amendment:

And there was, furthermore, guaranteed and secured to all persons, regardless of race or color, that the States should forever thereafter not deny but afford to them the equal protection of the laws.

That is the argument that has been made here. Continuing, he said:

The effect, therefore, of the two clauses when taken together was to place all individuals upon an absolute equality before the law in all matters essential to the preservation of life and liberty and for the pursuit of happiness—and to guarantee and secure to every individual that he should have the same protection of the laws that all other individuals have, and that all proceedings against him or his property should be conducted in accordance with the regular methods of procedure (p. 46).

Then, again, he says:

But it is the guarantee of State action to protect each individual in the enforcement of his rights, and the guarantee that all State action shall be by due and equal process of law that specially concerns us in the present inquiry (p. 46).

In the enforcement of the rights and privileges secured by the fourteenth amendment the United States is not restricted to actions corrective in their nature and antagonistic to the State governments, but may act in conjunction with or even independently of the States (p. 50).

It was contemplated that in some instances the State authorities would refuse to enforce this amendment, and that in other instances the State authorities would be unable to do so, and for that reason it was provided in the fifth section that it should be enforced by the United States by and through appropriate legislation by Congress. No limitation is placed upon the character of this legislation, except that it shall be appropriate for the purpose. But if there is any one thing that is perfectly clear from the language of the amendment it is that the rights and privileges secured shall be enforced, and that regardless of the State's will. And there can be no less doubt that in case a State should refuse, or be unable to enforce them, the United States authorities, acting under congressional enactment, may proceed to their enforcement independently of the States. This position is abundantly sustained by the decision of this court, and never denied except in dicta (p. 53).

But can there be any practical difference between the incapacity of the State authorities growing out of their judicial system, and their incapacity arising from sheer want of physical power to afford the accused this right? In the latter instance the right is just as important to the accused as in the former, and the amendment contains no warrant for a distinction between the two conditions (p. 55).

The defendant set at defiance the pledges of the fourteenth amendment by slaying Maples to prevent him from being tried by due process of law and from having the equal protection of the laws, while they were being administered to him by the very authorities which were designated by the amendment as the proper authorities to administer them (p. 59).

Then, again, on pages 61 and 62, the Attorney General argues as to the meaning of the fourteenth amendment:

What we conceive to be the fundamental error in this argument is the idea that these "due process of law" and "equal protection" clauses are ordinary prohibitions. They can not be construed as prohibitions in the ordinary sense of that term. With reference to the latter clause, the word "deny," when standing alone, implies negative action, but when used in connection with the word "not" the two become a double negative, which, as the amendment is written in English and not in Greek, is equivalent to an affirmative, and means "grant." (P. 61.)

There is nothing strained or peculiar about the simple expression "nor deny the equal protection of the laws." It means "grant the equal protection of the laws," and all the reasoning of the sages and the most profound jurists can never make it mean anything else. And the United States has, therefore, had written right in the face of its Constitution, as a pledge to everyone residing within the jurisdiction of the States, that those States shall grant to them the equal protection of their laws. (P. 62.)

The exact question here presented is this:

When the State authorities possess the will to enforce the rights secured by this amendment, but are entirely helpless, is it beyond the power of the United States to come to their assistance? Has the National Government undertaken to create and secure certain rights and privileges, and yet, when a State is too weak to enforce them, must it sit with folded hands and complacently witness the willful murder of its citizens in violation of those rights and privileges? If the hand of the Government must be stayed until the State shall develop antagonism, then fortunate is he who falls into the hands of hostile State authorities, because he may entertain some hope of a trial by due process of law and of the equal protection of the laws, while he who falls into the hands of State authorities who are willing to grant the accused such protection, but are unable to do so, is without hope, because neither the State, from physical weakness, nor the United States, from inherent feebleness, can afford him the necessary relief. (P. 63, 2d par.)

If one of our armed vessels were in a foreign port and the commander should there refuse to protect an American citizen against a mob which had overcome the local authorities and were threatening his life, such commander would be discharged from the service in disgrace. And yet it is seriously urged that a citizen of this Government, to whom it has guaranteed trial by due process of law and the equal protection of the laws, while in the hands of State authorities, who are honestly endeavoring to carry out those Federal guaranties, may be by superior force wrested from such authorities and murdered in order to prevent him from exercising and enjoying those rights, and that the Government—the very Government that claims to have secured to him these rights and privileges—can not aid the State authorities in resisting the mob or inflict upon its members punishment for setting at defiance the laws written in its very Constitution. (P. 64.)

EXCERPTS FROM PETITION FOR REHEARING.

Suppose a State refuses by mere inaction to afford one the equal protection of the laws, has such person no relief? Or suppose, as was the case with Horace Maples, the State is unable to give him the equal protection of the laws, or to try him by due process of law, are these guaranties so worthless that they can afford him no protection? (P. 9.)

To determine this question against the United States is to deny all protection to its citizens when situated as Maples was, and to render it impossible for punishment to be inflicted upon those who commit murder in open defiance and in contempt of the fourteenth amendment. This is true, because experience demonstrates that the authorities of no State are able to punish those guilty of crimes of this character. (P. 11.)

Has anyone here presented anything not found in the argument of the Attorney General or presented it with more force or eloquence?

Now, listen to the excerpts from the decision of Judge Jones, printed in the record before the Supreme Court. I shall also print his syllabus, as therein he gives an explanation of the case. The syllabus was written by him:

UNITED STATES v. POWELL.

[Circuit court, northern district of Alabama, March 22, 1907.]

CONSPIRACY—CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DEPRIVATION OF RIGHTS—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

[Federal Reporter, vol. 151, p. 648.]

In Ex parte Riggins (134 Fed., 404) the circuit court ruled that certain counts of the indictment were good under constitutional amendment 13. It also held that two other counts based upon the fourteenth amendment were good, as the fourteenth amendment secured to a prisoner in custody of the sheriff, on accusation of crime against the State, the right, privilege, or immunity to have the benefit of a jury trial by the operation of the State's established course of judicial procedure, and that private individuals who lynched such a prisoner to prevent his enjoying the benefit of such a trial deprived him, in the constitutional sense, of a right secured to him under the fourteenth amendment, and could properly be indicted under sections 5508 and 5509 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. Comp. Stat. 1901, p. 3712). The defendant in this case, who obtained a severance and demurred to this indictment, was a codefendant with Riggins, who appealed to the Supreme Court (26 Sup. Ct., 147; 199 U. S., 547; 50 L. Ed., 303) from a decision of the circuit court refusing to discharge him upon habeas corpus. The Supreme Court, holding that habeas corpus was not the proper mode of testing such questions, quashed the writ. Riggins's appeal was argued and submitted at the same term as the Hodges case (27 Sup. Ct., 6; 51 L. Ed., —), which involved like questions under the thirteenth amendment. After the Supreme Court thus disposed of the Riggins appeal it decided the Hodges case, holding that similar rights to those claimed under the thirteenth amendment were not secured by the Constitution or laws, and made use of expressions in the latter opinion which, in the view the circuit court took of them, under the circumstances stated, made it doubtful whether the Supreme Court did not intend to hold that the United States has no power, under any circumstances, to deal with lawless private individuals for violation of rights secured under the fourteenth amendment.

The Government insisted that the expressions in the Hodges opinion as to the fourteenth amendment "went beyond the case," and should not "control the judgment" as to the rights and immunities here claimed under the fourteenth amendment. The circuit court, while satisfied as to the soundness of the Riggins case, as regards the counts based on the fourteenth amendment, was, nevertheless, of opinion that proper judicial subordination required the circuit court, under the circumstances stated, not to run counter to the last utterances of the Supreme Court as to the fourteenth amendment, though they "went beyond the case," and that the only court which could properly determine what was intended by these expressions is the Supreme Court itself, and accordingly held, sustaining the demurrers to the indictment, that no right, privilege, or immunity under the fourteenth amendment, in respect of due process at any stage of the duty of the State in affording it, is secured under that amendment, unless there is actual denial of the right by the State or its officers; and that private individuals who take a prisoner from the custody of the State's officers and murder him, to prevent his enjoying the benefits of a trial by the operation of the State's established course of judicial procedure, do not deprive him of the enjoyment in the constitutional sense of any right secured to him by the Constitution or laws, and were not therefore indictable under sections 5508 and 5509 of the Revised Statutes. (Syllabus by the court.)

EXTRACTS FROM A DECISION OF JONES, DISTRICT JUDGE, AND UNITED STATES V. POWELL (151 FED. REP., 648).

The precise issue the remaining counts present is whether a citizen lawfully held in the custody of the State, awaiting trial on a charge of crime, has any right or immunity, which Congress can protect under the fourteenth amendment, against lawless violence of private individuals, which prevents, and is designed to prevent, the State from affording the accused, when it endeavors to do so, the benefit of a trial according to the "law of the land," by the administration of the State's established course of judicial procedure (p. 650).

The performance of the duty by the State to its full extent is the dominant thought and purpose of the amendment. When the framers of the amendment, knowing that the States must continue to administer justice and punish crime within the State, coupled with this constant and continuing duty the condition that the States shall not deny due process of law, the substance of what they intended can not be less than that the State shall afford to every person enjoyment of the benefits of due process, when it starts out to administer its justice in his case. Unless we surrender abjectly to the witchery of mere grammatical expression and utterly desert the spirit of this clause, we must hold that the command, "no State shall deprive," etc., is only another form of command that each State shall afford enjoyment of the administration of its established course of judicial procedure in a case like this. The dominant end and purpose the amendment had in view were not merely that the States shall pass proper laws and furnish proper officers, who endeavor to execute them, but that the duty imposed upon the State shall be so fully performed that the citizen shall have actual, physical enjoyment of the benefits of the right, as distinguished from fictitious enjoyment, in theory of law, of a right in the form of an enchanting declaration upon parchment. One main aim of the amendment was, in short, to put an end to the denial of the State's justice by means of the execution of private vengeance upon criminals and persons charged with crime by lawless private persons when the prisoner was in the hands of the law by giving power to Congress, standing behind the effort of the State, to bring that purpose to pass by any mode whatever which does not overthrow or usurp the State's power (p. 652).

The other is a positive duty, and requires affirmative, sustained action at the hands of the States, compelling them, as we shall presently see, to do certain things, in given modes and times, in particular cases as they arise, without which the benefits of the right can not possibly be had (p. 653).

It by no means follows, however, that the amendment did not intend to confer power upon Congress to deal with lawless private individuals who interrupt the performance of the other duty flowing from the prohibition regarding due process. This duty, unlike the other, is a positive duty enjoined upon the State, and demands in particular cases as they arise affirmative action of a particular kind at its hands in some stages of the duty (p. 653).

The sum of the command in the case we have here is that the State must afford the prisoner the due administration of "its established course of judicial procedure" (p. 654).

The citizen or person can not, in the nature of things legal and finite, have enjoyment of the benefits of the right this clause is intended to secure by requiring the doing of those affirmative acts, if lawless private individuals, by themselves punishing the prisoner, prevent the State's officers from taking him into its tribunals, hearing him and his witnesses, confronting him with his accusers, and then having its officials in whom the power resides pronounce judgment of acquittal or conviction, as this clause of the Constitution commands the State to do (p. 655).

Plainly Congress may legislate under the fourteenth amendment to punish private individuals in such a matter as this, * * * (p. 660).

Congress was therefore given power to see that the States accomplished their task. The General Government is not left to the means provided by the States to secure any rights which the Constitution commands the States to afford. It may or it may not depend upon such instrumentalities. It is not bound, under the fourteenth amendment, to leave the protection of these rights to the execution of State laws, however inefficient it may prove in bringing about the results intended by the Constitution. It is not compelled to sit still until the State calls for the military arm of the Government to put down individuals who defeat enjoyment of these rights by preventing the execution of State laws (p. 661).

Having determined to this end that the United States might supervise and correct the action of the local sovereign, it would seem strange, indeed, if the amendment intended to deny to the General Government in accomplishing its object all power to deal with private individuals who were subject to but resisted the laws of the local sovereign (p. 662).

We ought not to shrivel the power by treating it as a mere penal enactment against faithless State officers (p. 662).

This powerful and luminous argument of the Attorney General and the equally able argument in the decision of Judge Jones were rejected by the Supreme Court. I might say, I hope, without being offensive, that the arguments that we have heard on this floor during this discussion are mere reflections and reiterations of the arguments presented by the Attorney General of the United States and by Judge Jones to the Supreme Court in the Powell case. How fatuous it is then to indulge the hope that similar arguments will be of any avail to overturn the oft-repeated decisions of that court. Why not frame a bill consonant with the decisions of the Supreme Court?

I want to grant to these colored people every right and every protection that the Constitution of the United States authorizes us to grant, but I am unwilling to trifle and juggle with them. There is going to be a hereafter, and if this law is passed in its present form, when the Supreme Court holds it unconstitutional, as it surely will, they will come back and say that we have trifled with them, that we have juggled with them, and that we have handed to them a "gold brick."

I am willing to go as far as the law will permit us to go, and where the law will not permit us to go I am willing to support an amendment to the Constitution of the United States that will enable us to reach the crime of lynching and give them real, actual protection; but I am not willing to subscribe to a bill that I believe is, in the most part, vain, idle, nugatory, and unconstitutional. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

THE PROPOSED DYER ANTILYNCHING LAW, SO CALLED, AND ITS UTTER FUTILITY.

Mr. JEFFERS of Alabama. In my remarks it is my purpose to impress you with the fact that the people of that section of the country where I live realize the obligation that rests with state and county to stamp out mob law in all its forms.

If anyone has any idea that my people condone lynching, or lawlessness in any form, I want to disillusion your mind, for that is not true. We know there is a duty which rests upon the State, and there is also a duty resting upon the people, both white and black; we know that. It is wrong for anyone to say that any State acquiesces in lynch law.

I want to tell you how Alabama, for example, is already handling this situation. And I want to say, my friends, that interference such as is provided in this foolish "alleged" antilynching law would actually hinder rather than help the handling of the problem.

Regarding this Dyer bill let me say that it is a disciplinary measure appearing here under a misleading name. Its utter futility is apparent; it is an unnecessary and an unwarranted slam at all State and county judicial and executive officers; and it is an unfair imposition upon innocent citizens and taxpayers. It would tend to encourage criminals to more boldly and freely attempt crime, and the natural result would be, therefore, that it would make matters worse instead of better.

ALABAMA HAS TAKEN STEPS HERSELF TO HANDLE THE SITUATION.

So anxious has Alabama been to suppress mob violence that the people included in the constitution of the State provision for the impeachment of sheriffs where a prisoner suffered death or grievous bodily harm owing to the neglect, connivance, cowardice, or other grave fault of the sheriff. (Ala. Const., 1901, sec. 138.) And to prevent the nonenforcement of this provision because of local public sentiment the State constitution provides for the impeachment of sheriffs by the supreme court, or court of last resort. (Ala. Const., 1901, sec. 174.) Our supreme court has unhesitatingly removed sheriffs whenever any negligence whatever could be traced to them in such cases.

The Alabama statutes also provide that the governor, and in some instances the circuit judges or sheriffs, may use the State militia to suppress mob violence. (Ala. Crim. Code, 1907, sec. 7396 et seq.) For this purpose the governor may transfer trained policemen to any part of the State. (Acts of Ala., 1919, pp. 163–164.)

I am opposed to lynching and believe that every legitimate effort should be made to suppress it, and to punish those who engage in mob violence. But even if Federal legislation could be validly enacted, vesting in Federal courts the jurisdiction to try such cases, I do not think that such Federal legislation would serve in Alabama to materially assist in suppressing lynching. My reasons for this conclusion are as follows:

First. By constitutional provision sheriffs of Alabama are already held to the highest degree of care in protecting persons from mob violence, and their impeachment for a failure to furnish this protection is removed from local influence.

Second. The judicial and executive officers of the State of Alabama are as high-minded, patriotic, and as fearless in the discharge of their official duties as are the Federal officers.

Third. The jurors before whom such law violators would be tried in the Federal courts would necessarily be drawn from the same citizenship as the jurors of the State courts. In the jury boxes in the State of Alabama will be found the names of people of high character and intelligence. As intelligence and high, patriotic ideals go hand in hand, it follows that a just verdict would be just as often returned in the State courts as in the Federal courts.

Fourth. This bill is purely a disciplinary measure, and is a rank imposition on the State.

As the Brooklyn Eagle thoughtfully points out:

In the last analysis a man's guilt or innocence must be decided by 12 good men and true, whether in a Federal or a State court.

It is difficult to see where Federal intervention would change the procedure of courts composed of the same class of citizens. In all probability all the latent well-meaning back of this effort to stop lynching would be more than neutralized by vicious outcroppings of racial hate. It would go far to defeat the growing understanding between whites and blacks and to prove a backset to the sociological evolution now taking place in the South.

The South's opposition to the Dyer bill is not based on any sympathy with mob violence, but it is mainly, I believe, based upon the fact that it is a farcical sham that will do no real good. Instead it will do untold harm.

Upon the passage of this bill it would be found that it would be understood by some—from the very name of it—to be a law enacted to protect the guilty from the extreme penalty, and it would encourage the would-be rapist to more boldly attempt to do his fiendish work. As a general rule, wrong methods for the correction of an evil will cause more harm than the evil as it is. All good citizens, South, East, North, and West, stand together in opposition to "lynching," but this proposed legislative panacea, which penalizes the innocent and makes whole communities suffer together for the lawlessness of a few, is not consistent with American ideas of justice and fair play and commits one offense in trying to remedy another. It is fundamentally wrong; it can not be worked; it will not do to pass it.

Why this unwarranted slap at the efficiency and the loyalty of every local sheriff, of every local deputy, of every local judge on the bench, and of every good citizen whose name is in the jury box of his good county? Why this unwarranted disciplinary feature against all citizens of this country, this illegal proposal to paste a disciplinary fine of $10,000 on their county treasuries? Would good American sheriffs and deputies and judges and jurymen accept that insult in good grace? Would innocent American citizens and taxpayers accept the disciplinary $10,000 fine in good grace? No; they would not. And you know they would not.

This manifestly unfair proposition will never work, and you know it will not. This measure reflects petulence and littleness and a desire to spank American officials and citizens like so many schoolboys. It is childish, it is foolish, and it is not consistent with the American way of facing facts squarely or of meeting issues fairly. [Applause.]

Some gentlemen present may feel that they are doing a wonderful thing for the entire colored race, but believe me when I tell you that you are only playing to some of the so-called "big Negroes" of the North, who are, in my opinion, the worst enemies that the mass of the colored people have. The Negro of the South, and that is where the Negroes live, knows that the southern white man understands him and wants to treat him right if he himself will keep his place and behave. But while the southern white man will treat the colored people right, he will never change the social dead line, well established and well understood, and whenever the Negro oversteps the white man's dead line he knows, and he is so informed by the right-thinking members of his own race, that he thereby takes his life in his own hands.

I do not condone lynching, and neither do any of you here, but I can imagine the terrible despair that must be felt in the heart of the man upon whose loved one has fallen the blighting hand of the brutal rapist. And when that cold steel has pierced the heart of any man, be he the most law-abiding citizen of any community, I have some slight conception of the blackness that must engulf his very soul and of the blindness of his uncontrollable rage, and naturally he has the sympathy of his neighbors.

Still, while we have some idea of the feelings of the people of an outraged community, and while we sympathize with them, we know that lynching is illegal, and we know that the influence of the cool-headed citizens must be used to see that the law takes its course. It is then, in the most extreme cases like this, that the strong, leading spirits of the community and loyal public officials have bravely thrust themselves into the breach, pleading with the frenzied men to let the law take its regular course, and have in many instances successfully exerted their influence. Time after time, under circumstances like these, the reasoning of these calmer heads has prevailed, and great victories have been won for law and order as against mob rule. So it is highly important that we encourage these officials and other leaders upon whom we must depend in times like this, and not insult and discourage them with such threats of unfair punishment as this legislation provides for.

The people of the South know the obligations resting upon the State and county to stamp out mob law. The people of the Southern States are not lawless. They will handle this situation better by State authorities than it could ever be handled by Federal authorities. Let me read a very timely and well-worded editorial from an Alabama daily—the Selma Times-Journal—which calls attention to the duty resting upon the community, and which at the same time points out the manifest futility of this proposed Federal disciplinary measure:

The Federal antilynching bill has been favorably reported by the committee in the House, and its passage will be vigorously pressed by the Republican majority. The bill is an effort to redeem the pledge given in the Republican platform, and which was incorporated in that document as a means of corralling the Negro vote in the doubtful States.

The bill is drastic in its provisions and also unjust, as it penalizes the innocent for the crimes of the guilty. It is intensely antisectional and is believed to be fatally defective. It requires that all persons who are accused of participating in a lynching shall be tried in a Federal court. All counties where a lynching occurs are subject to a fine of $10,000. All officers who fail to make reasonable efforts to apprehend and punish the lynchers shall be adjudged guilty of a felony. Those who are convicted of being members of a mob may be sentenced to life imprisonment.

Unfortunately for the contrivers of this new statutory device no means is provided for taking the subject matter out of the hands of the juries. The juries even in the Federal courts must pass upon the cases brought before them, and it may be safely foreknown that their sympathies and interests will make them recoil from verdicts that will not only condemn the actual offenders but will involve influential public officials and assess heavy penalties against their own communities and against themselves. Right here the law will prove abortive and of little value. It will not, no matter how buttressed with safeguards, be able to rise above the jury box. If the law seeks to throw the responsibility of a lynching upon the entire community, then the community, in self-preservation, will reject the imposition.

The manifest futility of this proposed Federal enactment will not, however, relieve any community of the obligation that rests upon it to stamp out mob law. Wherever these exhibitions of savagery occur the whole morale of a people suffers. No State or county should undertake to protect or condone such outrages, but the communities should themselves take up the work of preventing these disgraces and of making such usurpations as the new Federal antilynching bill unnecessary.

I tell you in all seriousness that there is no remedy in such an impossible measure as is this bill. The States are able to take care of their own affairs in this connection, and they will do it. The authorities of the several States should, and I am sure they are taking up this question in all seriousness to find out the best possible solution that may be obtained by their own legislation and judicial reform. And then the leaders of the colored race must impress seriously upon their people the necessity of virtue and morality and create among them a sentiment which will make the member of their race an outcast who commits the crime which so often leads to lynching.

Former President Roosevelt, discussing the question said:

Every colored man should realize that the worst enemy of his race is the Negro criminal, and above all the Negro criminal who commits the dreadful crime of rape; and it should be felt as in the highest degree an offense against the whole country and against the colored race in particular, for a colored man to fail to help the officers of the law in hunting down with all possible earnestness and zeal such infamous offender.

Help us, my friends, to solve our problem, but do not make the handling of it all the harder for us by passing this measure that we have before us here now under the name of an "antilynching" bill.

Is it not a fair and reasonable suggestion that the advice of the Representatives in the National Congress from the section of the country most affected be taken in this matter? For example, I, myself, am willing to take the advice and abide by the opinions of my colleagues in this body who are here from out on the coast regarding the Japanese question out there. I have never lived in California. I realize that I can not see and understand the situation there as well as the man who lives there. I believe the Representatives from the Pacific coast would advise me honestly and well as to the desirability of any legislation especially concerning their particular section of the country. I know they understand the situation better than I, who have never lived there. And, therefore, on matters concerning their yellow problem out there, I would be guided more by their advice than by the advice of men from other sections. So is it not a reasonable suggestion that the serious arguments of the Representatives from the South be heeded in connection with this alleged antilynching measure? If you will think for a moment you must realize that they know the situation.

From the daily press we have seen that practically all of the petitions that have come to Congress asking for the enactment of this legislation have been from colored societies, and in the cases that I have noticed these petitions have been given out at points very far removed from that part of the country where most of the colored people live.

My advice to the leaders of the Association for the Advancement of Colored People and the Colored Congress and Society for Amity Between the Races, and the 5,000 Negroes who recently assembled in New York and petitioned Congress, is that if their sincere desire is to stop the lynching of members of their own race they are on the wrong track when they spend their time framing and delivering petitions to Congress asking for the passage of this perfectly futile measure, which would only tend to arouse sectional as well as racial feelings. The State authorities do not want any lynchings within their borders, and are honestly trying to stamp out mob law. They are trying earnestly and energetically—and making progress, too, I may say—to develop strong public sentiment in this direction, and if these so-called "leaders" of the Negroes want to do something worth while to really help stop lynching, so far as their own race is concerned, then my advice to them is that instead of sending petitions to Congress to pass this bill they should be finding a way to impress upon the people of their own race the fact that they must themselves help by stopping the crimes for which lynching often occurs. If they will bend their efforts seriously in that direction they can help materially.

Do not make the problem all the harder to handle. You who want to do the right thing and help—not hinder. Vote against this bill, my friends, it is a farcical, impossible, futile thing—I tell you it will never do. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LARSEN].

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE DYER ANTILYNCHING BILL.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, the caption of the pending bill, so far as its practical effect is concerned, should be: "An act to assassinate State rights; to nullify the constitutions of the several States; to corrupt public morals; to encourage rape and race riots; and to pension the families of rapists and despoilers of society."

The purpose and intention of the bill is obvious. There is little or no attempt to conceal it. Everyone realizes that it is to be enacted for political purposes, to enable the Republican Party to more firmly secure its hold upon the Negro vote, and to bow to the demands of race agitators and Negro organizations of the North. Individual Members with large Negro constituencies are evidently impelled to support the measure upon the basis of self-preservation. Gentlemen, you are paying too much for your whistle.

Heretofore the race problem has been confined almost exclusively to the South. If I mistake not the trend of the times, within a short while the North will also be compelled to grapple with the proposition. Your density of population will lessen your exposure to rape, the chief cause of lynching, but the question of social equality, race riots, and other race problems will vex you. May I say to the Representatives of the North that when these trying hours come you will then understand and appreciate the South with its problems.

Yesterday I listened with regret to the address of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Senator BURTON. He frankly admitted doubt as to the constitutionality of the proposed law, but, in effect, said the public demand for it was such that we should pass the bill and let the courts determine its constitutionality.

Can it be the gentleman has forgotten that Members of Congress are sworn to support the Constitution? If there be doubt as to the constitutionality of a proposed law, shall we resolve that doubt in favor of public opinion and assume the responsibility of swearing a lie, even though our God-given conscience suggests a doubt? At Cooper Union February 27, 1860, Mr. Lincoln said:

> No man who has sworn to support the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it.

My God, how the party of the immortal Lincoln has degenerated.

I would not attempt to justify lynching or murder in any form. No person can, but lynching is as susceptible of justification as is rape, the primary cause of lynching. Which is the more shocking to the sensibilities of society—information that some pure, white girl has been raped in the community by a black brute or that some person, black or white, guilty or innocent, has been lynched by an infuriated mob? There can be but one answer. Of the two, rape is infinitely worse.

Do you understand the emotions which actuate mobs in lynching for rape? Do you understand that our National Constitution, Article VI of amendments, requires that defendants charged with crime shall be given a public trial and confronted with witnesses testifying against them? When a virtuous female has been raped and ruined by a black brute, would you have her suffer further humiliation by being dragged before the court and the curious public to tell in detail the story of her disgrace and ruin? If you understand all this and many other gruesome matters which enter into the subject, you may understand the spirit of the mob. Would we not serve a better purpose by amending the Constitution so as to provide that defendants charged with rape may be given a private trial before the court with an impartial jury? Would not this lessen lynchings to a far greater extent than the proposed law?

Rape is worse than murder. Some of you may not regard the crime of rape as atrocious as do the people of the South. I know that in Ohio the maximum penalty for the crime of rape is only 20 years' imprisonment in the penitentiary, unless the rape be committed upon one's own sister or daughter or female less than 12 years of age, in which event it may be life imprisonment. I know that in New York and many other Northern States 20 years is the maximum penalty for rape. In Pennsylvania it is only 15 years' imprisonment or $1,000 fine.

In Georgia, and I believe all other Southern States, we regard the crime as more atrocious. We feel that a man has no more right to rape the daughter or sister of another than to rape his own. We do not believe he should be permitted to rape females of any age. If he should do so, we believe he has wrecked a life and forfeited the right to live; hence the penalty of the law for rape is death.

The proponents of the bill have an abundance of statistics as to lynchings which have occurred within the last 30 years, but no one of them can tell us the number of rapes which have occurred during the same time, or for any specific period. Can they tell us whether lynchings have, to any degree, diminished the crime of rape? No. They simply say it has not prohibited it. Certainly not, but the question is, Has it diminished it? The laws against murder do not prohibit it, but they deter. The proposed law will not prohibit lynching, but will undoubtedly encourage rape. As already pointed out, the antilynching law of South Carolina, in force for a quarter of a century, has not prevented lynching in that State, nor is it contended the antilynching law of Ohio has prevented it there.

Lynching is murder, and murder is a violation of law in every State of the Union. As long as no State denies to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws, Congress has no constitutional authority to pass the proposed bill. Mind you, the Constitution says that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." It does not say that it shall guarantee and afford to each person equal protection from assaults of citizens. This must be recognized as impossible in the practical operation of State or National affairs. It is a sufficient compliance when the laws do not discriminate and afford equal protection to every person within its jurisdiction.

If the bill as written should be enacted into law, it will, of course, be held unconstitutional. No court would jeopardize its reputation for integrity and knowledge of legal procedure by declaring such law valid and constitutional. To construe it otherwise would constitute one of the most infamous judicial rapes of our National Constitution ever recorded in the annals of legal jurisprudence. I can not understand how an unbiased person with legal knowledge, who has studied our Constitution and the provisions of the bill, can reach any other conclusion.

Where and when did the States delegate to the Federal Government the right to make criminal laws to govern any State? What paragraph of the Constitution denies to the States their full enjoyment and discharge of such rights and powers?

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people. (See Article 10, Constitution.)

It is admitted by all that there is no authority for the proposed legislation unless it be found under the provisions of the fourteenth amendment. Let us, therefore, consider the question in the light of the decisions of our courts.

The fourteenth amendment provides that no State shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of its laws."

What does this mean? Regarding the amendment in the case of United States v. Cruikshank (1 Woods, 308), the court said:

> It is a guaranty against the exertion of arbitrary and tyrannical power on the part of the Government and the legislature of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses; and the power of Congress, whether express or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require or authorize Congress to perform the duty that the guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform, and which it requires the State to perform.

In One hundred and sixth United States, page 638, the above is approvingly cited in the case of United States against Harris.

Again, in United States v. Cruikshank et al. (92 U. S., p. 542), the court said:

> Sovereignty for the protection of the rights of life and personal liberty within the respective States rests alone with the States.

In Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., p. 313) the court holds:

> The prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment have exclusive reference to State action. It is the State which is prohibited from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law—

And so forth.

In the famous Civil Rights case, United States v. Stanley et al. (109 U. S., p. 11), discussing the fourteenth amendment the court said:

> It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation.

The law books are full of decisions to this effect, such as Barbier v. Connolly (113 U. S.); Pembina Mining & Milling Co. v. Pennsylvania (125 U. S.); James v. Bowman (190 U. S.); Barney v. City of New York (193 U. S.); Keller & Ullman v. United States (213 U. S.), which discuss the question and show conclusively the unconstitutionality of the proposed bill. But why submit additional authorities upon a proposition so plain?

In conclusion, let me say it may be—shocking as it is to conceive—that public opinion holds the virtue of its women in no higher respect than does it regard property. In some States—Pennsylvania, for instance—it may be possible for a black brute to lay his lecherous hands upon the fair form of a virtuous white girl, deflower her youth, blacken and wreck her life, and by counting out a thousand filthy dollars walk out of the courtroom free to repeat his heinous offense. But, thank God, in Georgia, and in other States who share her ideals, if a brute lay his hands in violence upon a woman, be he black or white, high or low, rich or poor, born within or without her borders, he shall pay with his life for this offense. No act of Congress or proclamation of President can change this law or abate one jot or tittle thereof.

With pride and reverence, I stand by the traditions and ideals of my people and under my oath to support the Constitution I vote "No."

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BELL].

Mr. BELL. Mr. Chairman, Congress enacts too many laws. A large per cent of the legislation enacted here should be left to the States, and if we continue a few years longer to usurp authorities delegated to the States under the Constitution, we will not be able to tell where State lines begin or where they end, so far as the laws of the land are concerned. It would be far better for the country as a whole if Congress should repeal numerous laws which have been enacted here and leave these matters to the jurisdiction of the States.

In my judgment, the bill now being considered, if it should be adopted, would be without avail, dangerous and fraught with many consequences. We are drifting too much to Federal control of our affairs, and the day is coming, in my judgment, when the Nation will suffer on account of our tendencies and activities. We must halt. We can not afford to continue to further disregard the spirit and letter of the Constitution and usurp police powers delegated to the States. That this measure is sectional in its nature there is no doubt. That it has some political significance there appears but little question. If this is the thought which engages the proponents of this measure, they will find themselves badly mistaken in the results, and the passage of this bill will be as big a political blunder as that made by President Harding in his recent Birmingham speech.

To advocate political equality between the races carries with it social equality, as it would be impossible to separate one from the other to a certain and marked degree. To wish upon the South a division of political preferences with the Negro is something which will never be tolerated and should not be advocated by anyone, not even a Republican President.

Some of the advocates of this measure have stated that the bill is not sectional. This will do for the RECORD, but it is not digestible. I believe that 50 per cent of the Republican membership of this House regret the reporting of this bill, and, in reality, prefer not to vote for it. I believe the time is opportune for these Members to vote their convictions and disregard the report of the committee having charge of legislation of this character. I can not believe it the duty of any Member to vote for a measure not consistent with his views merely because it is favorably reported from a committee of the majority side. If we commit ourselves to a proposition, which, according to our individual opinions, is not constitutional nor wholesome nor to the best interest of the entire country, we may certainly expect just criticism of our deeds. In this connection I ask permission to incorporate as a part of my remarks an editorial which appeared recently in the New York World, which runs as follows:

LYNCHING THE CONSTITUTION.

[From the New York World.]

No newspaper in the country has more constantly and more bitterly fought the lynching evil than the World. But the World is not in favor of lynching the Constitution of the United States in order to reach the evil, and particularly when so desperate a remedy would come to nothing.

This is what the so-called Dyer antilynching bill, now being jammed through Congress by the Republican majority, amounts to, and all it amounts to. Lynching is made a Federal crime by this measure, and participators are subject to Federal prosecution and localities are held nationally responsible to pay money damages to the families of victims.

If Congress can validly make this kind of offending a Federal crime, there is no felony or misdemeanor known to the laws of any State which can not be made a Federal crime and imposed upon the Federal authority for detection, prosecution, and punishment. If then, perchance, there should remain any vestiges of the police power and reserved rights of the States, they could also be swept into the maw of centralization until nothing would be left but the name, and that would soon become but a memory.

The proposition would be as vain in practice as it is obviously unconstitutional. No State is now without antilynching laws, and many of them, including those of the South, are of the most stringent character. The Federal authority and processes under the proposed bill would have to run in the affected districts as the State authority now runs, and how much more effective would they likely be when subject to the same obstructions affecting the administration of State law?

The Dyer bill is a michievous and essentially a lawless measure and every effort should be made to prevent its enactment.

The World is one of the best newspapers published in the United States and has for many years consistently protested against lynching, and such an editorial coming from this great daily is timely and should be seriously considered by the Congress before they pass a measure which, as the World says, "lynches the Constitution" and which adds to our statutes one that is unconstitutional, sectional, political, useless, nagging, and offensive.

I can not bring myself to the conclusion that a majority of this Congress will vote for this bill in its present form, when, in fact, no part of it should become a law.

I think the proposition to penalize a people of one county because a crime has been committed in another county is the most outrageous proposition ever presented to an intelligent body. Under the provisions of this bill a half dozen counties in a State could be penalized in the sum of $10,000 each, and yet be as innocent of any knowledge of the crime committed and as innocent of any dereliction of duty as any of the proponents of this bill.

Gentlemen, if you favor this kind of legislation, it is evident you are hungry for sectional strife and disturbances. I come from a State that the gentleman from Kansas claims—from the report of a former governor—has furnished more lynchings than any other State in the Union. It will be remembered that this selfsame governor was obliged to retract numerous statements he made in his report, and it developed, so I am informed, that several so-called lynchings which he enumerated turned out to be ordinary fist fights.

It is unfortunate that a high official of any State would deliberately misrepresent conditions, thereby casting reflection upon one of the best, if not the best, State in the Union and populated with as good men and women as inherit the universe. This once governor can not, or would not, attempt to prove that any county, municipality, or State officer had failed or refused to do his duty in trying to apprehend the guilty parties in any of the many cases which were enumerated by him.

Since it is true that 90 per cent of the crimes committed for which lynchings sometimes follow is committed by Negroes it will be of interest, no doubt, to some to note the population of some of the States. These figures are official and were tabulated by the census of 1920: In New York State there are 11,182,027 white people and only 198,483 Negroes; in Pennsylvania there are 8,432,726 whites and 284,568 Negroes; in Ohio, 5,571,893 whites and 186,187 Negroes; in Indiana, 2,849,068 whites and 80,810 Negroes; in Missouri, the home State of the introducer of this bill, there are 3,225,044 whites and only 178,241 Negroes; in Kansas, the home of the chairman of the Rules Committee of the House and a strong advocate of the passage of this bill, there are 1,708,906 white people and only 57,925 Negroes. In Georgia there are more Negroes than any State in the Union, there being 1,689,114 whites and 1,206,365 Negroes; in North Carolina, 1,783,779 whites and 763,407 Negroes; in Tennessee, 1,885,993 whites and 451,758 Negroes; in Alabama, 1,447,032 whites and 900,652 Negroes; in South Carolina, 818,538 whites and 864,719 Negroes, being 46,181 more Negroes than whites in this State; in Mississippi there are 853,962 whites and 935,184 Negroes, 81,222 more Negroes than whites. There are 220,151 more Negroes in Georgia than there are in New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Missouri, and Kansas combined. We have very stringent laws against lynching, as well as all other crimes, and the States can and will handle the proposition as it should be, and can do so better than by Federal interference.

There is no room for doubt that after all the best friend the Negro has is the white man of the South, and no one knows this better than the Negro himself. The fact that the Negro remains there and is satisfied with his lot is certain proof that these statements are true.

If a good Negro in the South happens to misfortune or gets into trouble beyond his capacity to free himself his intitial step is to go at once to his white friends for assistance, where he knows he will get fair treatment. A good Negro in Georgia, and all over the South, gets credit from the white merchants and long-time indulgence from the landlord. If the gentleman from Kansas and the gentleman from Missouri should live only for a short while in the South they would soon find conditions there as I have described them, and they would within a few short moons be voting the Democratic ticket. A few days ago I clipped the following from the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution:

Presents are wanted for needy Negroes. Gifts for needy ones among the Negroes will be received at Clark University Sunday night at special Christmas services. The services will be conducted by the Clark Gammon Sunday School. Scripture readings, songs, carols, tableaux, and other exercises will be included in the program.

I wonder if such a notice as this has ever appeared in a newspaper in St. Louis, Mo., or in Pittsburg, Kans.?

I wonder if the proponents of this bill know that when a good Negro in the South loses his home by fire or storm that the white people of the vicinity go to his aid and help to make good his loss?

I wonder if the proponents of this bill know that the white ministers of the South go and preach to Negroes at their churches and help and encourage them in every way to become better citizens?

I wonder if the proponents of this measure know that often at the death of a white man in the South a legacy is left in his will for the Negro servants?

I wonder if the proponents of this legislation know that when a good Negro dies in our midst and leaves nothing with which to bury himself that the white people contribute to the expense and see that he has a decent and Christianlike burial?

Gentlemen, acquaint yourselves with the people of the South and the conditions which prevail with us, and if you will do so your advocacy of this bill will melt like a snow bank before a blistering sun.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this bill for two reasons: First, because I firmly believe that if it should become a law it would not suppress lynching in any part of the country but would, on the contrary, create race strife, race conflict, race riots, and lawlessness, particularly in the South, where there is now less race feeling than in any other section of the country; and secondly, because the proposed law is an unwarranted aggression upon the reserved rights of the States. By this law Congress is attempting to give to the Federal Government jurisdiction and control of the punishment of crimes occurring within the States. I do not believe that Congress has this power under the fourteenth amendment.

I have always lived in the South, and I am interested in the welfare of the Negro race. I suspect that my interest in their happiness and welfare is quite as real as and perhaps more than the interest of some of the people who are promoting this legislation. There are several thousand Negroes in my district. Most of them are my friends. The Negro race is not disfranchised in Tennessee, and practically all the Negroes who voted in my district in 1920 supported by candidacy, but I do not believe that the passage of this bill would serve their interests. I do not believe that Congress could pass any law that would be more harmful to the Negro race than the bill under discussion, unless it be a law to enforce social equality. I think that I may justly claim to know something about the Negro race, and especially something about their relationship with the white man in the South.

The Negro is a part of the agricultural and industrial life of the South, and his property rights are as fully protected in the South as in any other part of the country. This is not true politically either in theory or practice in some parts of the South, where the Negro population exceeds the white; and no man who is familiar with conditions in that section of the country will contend that it would promote the happiness or welfare of either the white man or the black man to alter conditions in that section of the country until the Negroes as a whole reach a higher plane of political and moral responsibility.

But if the misguided uplifters and agitators who profess so great an interest in the advancement of the Negro will let him alone, he will advance much more rapidly than he will with their uncalled-for and mistaken political advice. In reality there is no serious Negro or race problem in the South. The Negroes of the South live contentedly there. They are accumulating money and acquiring property. The decent, sensible Negro has no thought or desire for social equality. The States, counties, and towns provide the same, though separate, school facilities that they furnish for the white children. The property rights and personal rights of the Negro race are protected and enforced in the courts. The Negro is given every opportunity to advance himself. His relations with white people, as a rule, are friendly and cordial. And I undertake to say that the southern Negro does not want this legislation or any legislation which will bring him in political conflict with his white neighbor.

The progress which has been made by the Negro race in the South during the last 50 years is an assurance of the good intentions of the white man of the South toward the Negro race.

I have not secured sufficient time to enumerate all the objections which occur to me as respects the policy of Congress undertaking such legislation. I think one of the serious objections to the present consideration or passage of the bill is the total lack of evidence or reasonable prophecy of any resulting benefit. Granting that it is within the legislative power of Congress under the Constitution to pass such a bill, the question arises as to whether its passage will have any good effect. The enactment of the law by Congress would mean that in the mind of Congress a Federal law upon this subject would deter men from committing the offenses described in the bill, but I can see no reasonable ground for this expectation. Our experience in the concurrent enforcement of prohibition laws established by an amendment to the Constitution does not offer much encouragement to believe that Federal laws are now any more respected than the laws of the States. It used to be that when the Federal Government said a thing it meant unquestioned obedience, but we find now that the Federal amendment with respect to prohibition and the laws passed to enforce that amendment are no more effective and are no more respected than the State laws upon the same subject.

The question of the constitutionality of this bill has been exhaustively and ably discussed. I have listened with especial attention to the arguments in favor of the constitutionality of the bill, but the reasoning of its supporters has not demonstrated to my mind that Congress possesses the power claimed for it under the Constitution or under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution to deal with this question.

The act in substance provides that "mob or riotous assemblage" shall mean an assemblage of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority, and that if any State or subdivision thereof neglects or refuses to maintain protection to the life of any person against a mob, such State by reason of such failure shall be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State; that any State or municipal officer who possesses the authority as an officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by a mob or who has such person in his custody, who fails to make all reasonable effort to prevent such person from being put to death, or any officer charged with the duty of apprehending any person participating in a mob, who fails to make a reasonable effort to perform his duty in apprehending or prosecuting under the laws of the State all persons participating in such mob, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years or by a fine of $5,000, or by both; that any person who participates in a mob which takes from the custody of any officer any person held by such officer and puts such person to death, or any person who participates in any mob that prevents any State officer in discharging his duty and puts such person to death, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and imprisoned for life or not less than five years; that any person who participates in a mob by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony and imprisoned for life or not less than five years; that any county in which a person is put to death by mob shall forfeit $10,000, which may be recovered by an action in the name of the United States against the county for the use of the family of the person put to death, and if such forfeiture is not paid upon recovery of a judgment, such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment by levy of execution or by mandamus or other process; that in the event any person so put to death shall have been transported by a mob from one county to another county, each county in or through which he has been transported shall be liable to pay the forfeiture provided.

These provisions are clearly an invasion of the rights of the States—that is, of the rights reserved for the States by the Federal Constitution. Article X of the amendment to the Constitution provides that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

Under this section and under our constitutional system the power to establish police regulations and to control their internal affairs and to punish crime has been left with the individual States, because the Constitution has not conferred this power upon the Federal Government, and it can not be taken from the States and exercised by the Federal Government by any legislation passed by Congress. The limit of the Federal authority, as long ago defined by Judge Cooley, is to see that the States do not, under cover of their power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty and obstruct the exercise of any authority which the Constitution has confided to the National Government or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the Constitution.

I am a Republican mainly because I have believed from my reading and understanding of the history of our Government that the Republican Party is the successor in political thought and teachings of that party which constructed and secured the adoption of the Federal Constitution and strengthened it by judicial construction. I have looked upon the Republican Party as the defender of the Constitution. It is the party which, as I have understood, has held to the belief that the judicial department of the Government under the Constitution has the power to determine whether an act of Congress is or is not constitutional, and the Supreme Court of the United States, the highest judicial authority in our Government, charged with the duty of construing that instrument, has time and time again asserted in cases which have been cited, some of which I desire to refer to, that the Federal Government or Congress has no authority under the Constitution to enact laws to confer jurisdiction upon the Federal Government to interfere in the police regulations of the States.

The rights of the States to control their internal affairs and the duty of the Federal Government to recognize this right of the States is of supreme importance to this Nation. There is great danger in the continuance of the tendency to centralize power in the Federal Government. Mr. Root once made the statement that the grave danger to the stability of our Government was in making it "heavy at the top." The Civil War did not destroy the rights of the States. It settled for all time the proposition that a State can not withdraw or secede from the Union, but the right of the States to function within the sphere defined by the Constitution exists as fully now as it ever has in our history, and it is the duty, as I see it, of the Republican Party, as a great national party—the party of the Constitution—to respect these rights in all matters of legislation and to carefully preserve them. The Republican Party as a political organization has frequently given expression to its adherence to the Constitution and its determination to enforce particularly the reserved rights of the States. In the great national convention of 1884 the lamented William McKinley was chairman of the committee on resolutions, and wrote and reported a resolution as a part of the party platform of that year which forcibly and ably expressed the view of the party upon this important question. That resolution was as follows:

> The people of the United States, in their organized capacity, constitute a nation, and not a mere confederacy of States. The National Government is supreme within the sphere of its national duties; but the States have reserved rights which should be faithfully maintained; each should be guarded with jealous care, so that the harmony of our system of government may be preserved and the Union kept inviolate.

It is claimed that this bill is justifiable and can be defended under the terms of the fourteenth amendment, which provides that—

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, * * * nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Some of those who support the bill proclaim that there is no room for doubt as to its validity, but the more conservative and thoughtful recognize that there is doubt as to all its provisions and particularly with respect to section 5 and section 6 of the act, which provide for a forfeiture against a county in which a lynching occurs or through which the person put to death is transported. These provisions are so clearly and manifestly unconstitutional that no serious effort has been made here to defend them, at least none that I have heard or read. It seems to me that section 3, which undertakes to punish a State or county officer charged with the duty of protecting the life of persons under arrest or accused of crime and which undertakes to punish an officer who fails to perform that duty, comes more nearly within the power of Congress than the other sections, but I can not believe that this section is within the legislative competency of Congress. I can not believe that the fourteenth amendment gives the power to Congress to enact legislation to punish States or counties or individuals acting either as individuals or as officers and agents of States or counties, as the bill undertakes to do.

The fourteenth amendment was intended to and did give the Federal Government power to compel the States to afford equal protection to all citizens without discrimination, and the judicial branch of the Federal Government has frequently exerted the power of the Government under this amendment.

If it could be shown that the States or any State had failed to enact laws to punish lynching or murder or any other recognized crime, or that it had enacted a law to punish one class of people differently from another class or color or race for the same crime, Congress could, I suppose, correct the omission by the enactment of a law where no law is provided by the State, and the Supreme Court could and would, as it frequently has in the past, declare the discriminatory State law invalid because in violation of the fourteenth amendment.

The amendment operates against action by the States and not action by individuals over whom the States have jurisdiction under their police powers and regulations.

Lynching is murder, and it is conceded that all the States of the Union have adequate laws upon this subject just as the States have provided a Republican form of government, and it is not contended that any State acting as a State has enacted any law upon this subject which can be construed as denying the equal protection of the law to all its citizens. It is said that three thousand four hundred and some odd Americans have been lynched or killed by mobs since 1889 and that Congress can determine as a legislative fact that the equal protection of the laws guaranteed by the fourteenth amendment was not enforced by the States, and that the courts will not consider whether Congress was or was not justified, but will assume because of Congress having passed appropriate legislation that the States have denied "equal protection."

There has never been any determination by any court or any competent authority, or any authority charged with the duty of making an investigation of any failure by any State officer to protect the life of persons put to death by mobs, and there is no evidence before this Congress with respect to the dereliction of duty on the part of officers of the States. The statistics show that during the last year there was only one lynching in the State of Tennessee. Now, can Congress determine, as a legislative fact, from the evidence of one lynching, that the law is not being enforced in Tennessee, and that persons charged with crime and arrested in that State are not being accorded the equal protection of the laws? Congress would certainly not be warranted or entitled to reach such a conclusion. If Congress could do this and could base legislative action upon such a fact, it could just as logically and reasonably, upon the same reasoning, enact a law to punish offenders accused of larceny or embezzlement or any other crime, or for a murder committed by one person instead of by five. There were a number of murders committed in Tennessee last year, and hundreds of them in some States; for instance, in the State of New York. The newspapers frequently charge that in some places the officers of the law have been derelict in hunting down the persons who have committed these crimes. If Congress can pass this legislation upon the grounds asserted in its favor, it can just as logically be argued that it can pass a Federal law to punish for ordinary murder committed in the States, upon the ground that the States have not discharged their duty or that its officers and agents have not been diligent in preventing murder and other crimes. Rape is punishable by death or life imprisonment in all the States of the South, but notwithstanding the drastic punishment provided, this horrible crime is frequently committed. This is a fact. Congress knows it. Can Congress then say that since those States can not prevent the commission of these offenses against the State law and society, that it will enact a Federal law upon the subject? It is just as much and as clearly within the power of Congress to enact a law to punish for rape committed in a State as it is to enact the law under discussion.

This was not the intention of the amendment. The decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States have stated the purpose and scope of the amendment. I have examined the cases cited by the advocates of the bill. I do not think that these cases are authority for the constitutionality of the law. In all the cases cited where the court held some law or action by State officers or county officers to be in violation of the fourteenth amendment, it was shown as a fact and judicially determined in that particular case that the amendment had been violated and that the equal protection of the law had not been accorded the persons whose rights were involved.

It has been said that political expediency is responsible for the introduction of this bill. This may be true, but many gentlemen here have spoken publicly and privately in its favor or in favor of some law to mitigate the horrors of lynching because they realize, as every thoughtful man must and does, that it is an evil and a serious one in our civilization. The sincerity and good intentions of these men are not to be doubted, but I say to them that a way should be found to accomplish this which is within the power of Congress and which will not trespass upon the rights of the State, which we are bound to protect.

I say to them that we should proceed in an orderly and constitutional way. Would it not be better and wiser to follow the advice of the President and pass the resolution recommended by the President and introduced here, and investigate the facts with reference to lynching so as to determine what should be done, and would it not be wiser for Congress to base its action upon a report either of a commission or a committee of Congress? The statistics read here show that a certain number of persons have been put to death by mobs, but there is nothing to show whether these crimes could or could not have been prevented by State officers. If we could have an investigation conducted by a commission representing both races or by a committee of Congress, evidence might be produced upon which appropriate and constitutional legislation could be based. If this report should demonstrate that the States, or any of them, have not provided effective or adequate machinery to enforce the law or that the States are not honestly or in good faith attempting to protect a certain class of prisoners, or that the officers of the States are not, then Congress might, by appropriate legislation, propose assistance to the States or an amendment to the Constitution to give the Federal Government specific authority to deal with this important question.

This is not merely a political question. It can not be solved by the application of partisan political principles. We all agree as a civilized, law-respecting people that lynching and murder are indefensible and inexcusable. If it is desirable that the Congress should undertake to remedy the evil, it should proceed as it would toward the settlement of any great moral question—in a spirit of unity and of common helpfulness with the States and not in a spirit of antagonism and political distrust.

SUPREME COURT DECISIONS.

The Supreme Court has frequently construed and defined the scope and meaning of the fourteenth amendment. In United States v. Cruikshank (1 Woods, 308) Mr. Justice Bradley said:

It—the fourteenth amendment—is a guaranty against the acts of the State government itself. It is a guaranty against the exertion of arbitrary and tyrannical power on the part of the government and the legislators of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses, and the power of Congress, whether express or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppression of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require or authorize Congress to perform the duty that the guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform and which it requires the State to perform.

In Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313) the court, in speaking of the limitations of the fourteenth amendment said:

These provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals.

In United States v. Stanley, Ryan, et al. (109 U. S., 11) it was said:

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

In James v. Bowman (190 U. S., 127) the Supreme Court of the United States again explained its construction of the fourteenth amendment:

The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism; every republican government is in duty bound to protect all the citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States and still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right.

Other cases in point are the following:

Keller v. United States (213 U. S., 138), Hodges v. United States (203 U. S., 1), United States v. Harris (166 U. S., 138).

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BACHARACH].

Mr. BACHARACH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to the arguments that have been made against the adoption of this legislation, but I have heard nothing offered by the opponents of the bill which would incline me to vote against the bill. I shall vote for the bill because I am in hearty sympathy and accord with its intents and purposes.

The continued frequency of mob rule in the United States which usually culminates in the putting to death of the victim in many instances in a most repulsive and barbarous manner is a blot and a stain on our country's name and professed civilization, and such actions can not be justified under any circumstances.

I believe this bill, when enacted into law, will have a very powerful moral effect upon the law officers of the country. I can see no good reason why there should be any opposition to it, for no one can consistently condone the action of an infuriated mob bent upon wreaking vengeance upon a helpless victim, too often without substantial proof of the guilt of the victim, and in many instances carrying out the will of the mob in a manner far more gruesome than the crime of which the victim is charged.

It seems that the only argument those who are opposed to the bill have to offer is upon the constitutionality of the measure. I am not a lawyer and therefore I shall not attempt to argue that phase of the question. But as I view the proposition it has occurred to me that we Members of this House are not elected to pass upon the constitutionality of any legislation, since our Constitution wisely provides that another branch of the Government shall pass upon all questions bearing upon the constitutionality of any act passed by Congress.

However, I have not failed to notice that many of those who are opposing this bill on constitutional grounds made no such argument against the passage of the prohibition enforcement legislation which permits the Government to send its police officers into any section of the country for the purpose of assisting the State authorities to enforce the law, or to enforce it over the heads and authority of State officers if need be.

The adoption or enactment of the eighteenth amendment gave to Congress the power to enact any additional legislation necessary to enforce that amendment. This we did by a very decided vote with the overwhelming support of the Democratic membership of the House.

When the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution was adopted, Congress was given the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the amendment.

If it is constitutional for Congress to enact legislation to enforce the provisions of the eighteenth amendment, why is it not constitutional to take similar action to enforce the provisions of the fourteenth amendment?

The only criticism which I can offer on this score is that Congress has unfortunately too long delayed the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment.

As I view it, it seems to me that it is our duty to enact legislation when we believe the needs of the country demand it, and we are not charged with the responsibility of determining its constitutionality.

So far as this particular piece of legislation is concerned, I believe that it is good legislation, that the country demands it, and further that it is legislation within constitutional limits.

It is a source of much gratification to me that the great State of New Jersey, which I have the honor to represent in part, has been so free from the spirit of mob rule, and yet so sure and swift do our law officers and courts move in the prosecution of those charged with crimes which incent to mob rule that "Jersey justice" is known throughout the length and breadth of the land.

Last summer there occurred in my own district a most dastardly and repugnant crime, in which a little girl was literally hacked to pieces by a fiendish brute. He managed to escape before the crime was detected and fled the State. But returning a few months later he was recognized on the streets of a neighboring community, and after a battle, in which pistol shots were exchanged and a police officer seriously wounded, the man was captured and committed to jail. He was promptly tried before a jury, found guilty, admitted that he was given a fair trial, sentenced to death, and has since paid the penalty.

A more recent case happened in my neighboring district just a few days before Christmas, when another little girl was the victim of an attack by a degenerate. He succeeded in eluding the officers of the law for only a few days; finally he was captured, put in jail, tried by jury, found guilty, and sentenced to death, and he will pay the penalty of his crime in the early part of the coming month.

That is what we call "Jersey justice," and if the law officers and courts of every State would move with the same dispatch as we do in New Jersey there would be no need of action at the hands of the mob, nor would there be any demand for this legislation.

It seems to me that this legislation should appeal to the conscience of every person from a humanitarian standpoint if for no other reason. Too often the victim of the mob is innocent of the crime charged, but in the frenzy and disturbed mental state of his captors he is given no opportunity to prove his innocence, and in many instances false confessions are wrung from the victims by methods of torture so unmerciful and so inhuman that death is preferable to any further attempt on the part of the victim to convince the mob of his innocence.

The prevention of lynching in the United States is a question that has confronted the country for many years, and this legislation is brought forth with the hope and desire that it will put to an end a disgraceful evil in the United States of America, where civilization should be something more than a name.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. ing the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation, so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

THE OUTLAWRY OF WAR (S. DOC. NO. 115).

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I present a pamphlet entitled "Outlawry of War," containing a part of an address of the President and an article by Mr. Salmon O. Levinson, a distinguished attorney of Chicago. I ask that it be printed as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE OIL INDUSTRY.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. President, I present a communication from the Western Petroleum Refiners' Association relating to the oil industry and the proposed tariff duty on oil, which I ask be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WESTERN PETROLEUM REFINERS' ASSOCIATION,
Kansas City, Mo., December 2, 1921.

Hon. JOHN W. HARRELD,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HARRELD: I wish to call your attention to the fact that the independent oil industry is in the most serious prostrate condition it has ever experienced. Never before in the history of oildom were there so many independent refineries shut down as at this time. Some are in the hands of receivers; some have simply gone out of business; practically every one of them is running far short of capacity.

I desire to call your attention to the fact that when importations of Mexican crude were suspended last summer there was immediate improvement in the oil industry in this country. Almost instantly there was a demand for our own crude product. Refiners bid so actively for crude that they were soon paying, in the Burkburnett district, as high as 45 and 50 cents a barrel to the producers for their product. There was a market for our fuel oil. It began to look as if prosperity in some degree was returning to the American oil industry.

Then a few men went down to Mexico City and made some secret arrangement with the Mexican Government. Mexican shipments to this country were resumed and almost immediately the independent oil industry in the United States was again plunged into depression. We have 75,000,000 barrels more of crude in storage now than we had last spring, when crude prices were so spectacularly cut. We have entered the winter with 79 per cent more gasoline on hand than ever before in the history of the business. We have also entered the winter with 59 per cent more fuel oil on hand than in any previous time.

The result is, fully 50 per cent of our independent refiners are shut down. Many more have made arrangements to shut down and those that are still operating are running far short of capacity.

We are utterly unable to get any accurate statement of conditions in Mexico. For more than a year we were told again and again that Mexican oil wells had been "shot to pieces" with salt water; that in a little while Mexico would be a thing of the past. We have been heralded for years with the threadbare statement we were facing a petroleum famine and yet the fact remains, as near as we can learn, that Mexico is producing more oil to-day than she has ever produced and that we have had greater production of American crude with more refined products than at any other time.

One of the great difficulties with the oil industry is that it is groping most of the time in the dark. For instance, we do not know what arrangement was made with the Mexican Government. We can not find out. We simply know we are suffering the effects of that arrangement. Recently we wrote to the Department of Commerce and asked that an impartial and complete investigation of the Mexican oil situation be made and that the actual facts be given to the oil industry. I have a letter from Mr. Julius Klein, director, from which I quote, as follows:

"The interests of our own citizens in Mexico are so many and varied and the results of the special investigation you suggest might have such a profound effect upon them that it might conceivably be considered as unwarranted meddling for the Government to take sides in the controversy, as it would inevitably have to do if the investigation were made and the result published."

Thus, because the truth about Mexico would have a "profound effect" upon the operators in that field, incorporated under foreign laws, we must be denied the privilege of knowing the truth and must suffer the effects of disintegration.

Permit me to call to your attention the fact that since we went into the war the refinery at Baton Rouge, La., has become the largest refinery in the world. Another big plant has been erected at Charleston, S. C., another at Brunswick, Ga., another at Providence, R. I., another at Boston, Mass., etc., along the Atlantic coast. An immense refinery has just been completed at Toledo, Ohio, on the Great Lakes. With the exception of the latter, these refineries are all supplied with crude oil from Mexico. In spite of all statements to the contrary, as much gasoline is obtained to-day from Mexican crude as from most of the oils produced in this country.

Pipe lines are in operation from the Gulf of Mexico to Kansas City, Chicago, and eastern tidewater. Now with cheap crude coming into these coastwise refineries by water, with oil moving to inner strategic points by pipe line, and with railroad rates so high as to be practically prohibitive, is it any wonder the petroleum industry in the United States is in a chaotic condition? Is it any wonder hundreds of oil men have been financially ruined with the inevitable effect of these agencies mentioned? Is it any wonder the independent oil industry is on its knees begging the Interstate Commerce Commission for a reduction in freight rates and Congress for a protective tariff on Mexican crude?

Just so long as the country can be denied facts about Mexico and just so long as the conditions above referred to maintain just that long we are going to have a paralyzed petroleum industry, and when we consider how vitally important petroleum is to the Nation is not the industry entitled to greater consideration?

I am writing this as a personal letter and will be pleased to know your views.

Very sincerely, yours,

WESTERN PETROLEUM REFINERS' ASS'N.
By H. G. JAMES, Secretary.

ROBERT JUNE.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1245) for the relief of Robert June, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 443) thereon.

HEADWATERS OF MOBILE BAY BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, from the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 2994) to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge over and across the headwaters of Mobile Bay and such navigable channels as are between the east side of the bay and Blakely Island, in Baldwin and Mobile Counties, Ala.," approved October 5, 1917. I ask for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved October 5, 1917, authorizing the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct, operate, and maintain a bridge or bridges and trestles over and across the navigable channels of the mouth of Mobile River from Bay Port, in township 4 south, range 2 east, on the east shore of the waters of Mobile Bay, in Baldwin County, Ala., on a direct line, to a point on Blakely Island, in Mobile County, on the east shore of Mobile River, opposite the municipal docks of the city of Mobile, Ala., at a point or points suitable to the interests of navigation, be, and the same is hereby, revived and reenacted: Provided, That this act shall be null and void unless the actual construction of the bridge or bridges and trestles herein authorized be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date of approval hereof.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO TREASURY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL.

ROSE CROSSEN.

Mr. CALDER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 216), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Rose Crossen, sister of Philip A. Crossen, late a laborer in the employ of the Senate in the heating and ventilating department, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

EXPRESS RATES ON PERISHABLE FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. TRAMMELL submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 217), which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce:

Resolved, That the Committee on Interstate Commerce be, and it is hereby, directed to investigate the present high express rates being charged on citrus fruits, vegetables, and other perishable farm products, with a view to bringing about early legislation that will result in a reduction of the existing express rates on such perishable products.

NATIONAL GRAIN DEALERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, on the 22d of August last the Senate passed a resolution (S. Res. 110) directing the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to investigate a certain campaign which was alleged to have been waged against the United States Grain Growers (Inc.), but we failed in the resolution—and I assume it was probably my fault—to provide for the expenses of the investigation. I am now offering a resolution on that subject, which I assume will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and I ask the chairman of that committee if he will not give it his special attention, because the hearings in reference to the matter will commence on Monday next?

Mr. CALDER. I shall be glad to give the resolution consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 218) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Whereas on the 22d day of August, 1921, the Senate passed a resolution directing the Committee on Agriculture to investigate a campaign alleged to be waged against the United States Grain Growers (Inc.); and

Whereas said resolution did not provide for the employment of a stenographer or the subpœnaing of witnesses or the necessary expense of said investigation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture or any subcommittee thereof is authorized for the purposes embraced within said resolution No. 110 to employ a stenographer and to subpœna witnesses, and that the expense of said investigation be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

HAITI AND SANTO DOMINGO.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 219), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the relations between the United States and the Republic of Santo Domingo and the Republic of Haiti have assumed a condition which is unsatisfactory to the inhabitants of said countries, and otherwise disadvantageous to the United States, which condition is due in large measure to the presence of the naval forces of the United States in said countries and the exercise by the United States of the control of the finances and revenues of said countries; and

Whereas the purpose of the intervention by the United States in the political affairs of said countries, the direction of their revenues and finances, and the police of the same by the United States naval forces has been accomplished, and there is no further advantage either to the United States or said countries from any continued intervention in their affairs: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that the President should withdraw the naval forces of the United States now in Santo Domingo and Haiti and should arrange an abrogation of any treaty, protocol, or other agreement providing for the control of the revenues of Haiti or Santo Domingo by the United States, or providing for the intervention of the United States in the political affairs of either of said countries, and that it is the sense of the Senate that Santo Domingo and Haiti should be free from any external interference with their domestic policies or internal administration.

INVESTIGATION OF EXAMINING DIVISION, CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, some days ago the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate the resolution (S. Res. 199) providing for an investigation of certain proceedings of the Civil Service Commission. The resolution is on the table pursuant to a consent agreement by the Senate. I think it will take but a moment to dispose of the resolution, and I therefore ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution, but I ask that it may be read.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 199), which had been reported with an amendment from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate by Mr. CALDER on January 9, 1922, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, who shall be members of the Committee on Civil Service, be appointed by the President of the Senate, and the said committee is hereby authorized and instructed to investigate the proceedings of the Examining Division of the Civil Service Commission, and particularly to ascertain whether political influence has been used in said examinations and in the making and alteration of grades relating to the same, and whether the act of Congress giving preference to ex-service men in appointment to office under civil-service regulation has been observed and executed.

Said committee is empowered to sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as by it may be deemed advisable, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, to administer oaths and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, and such clerical assistance as may be necessary. All expenses of the committee incurred under this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers authorized by the committee and signed by the chairman thereof.

Said committee shall report its proceedings and findings to the Senate within 90 days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What is the question now before the Senate, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent is asked for the consideration of the resolution which is now on the table and which has just been read.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, personally I am not familiar with this resolution, not having heard of it before, but I should like to have an opportunity to study it in order to find out something about it. While, so far as I know, personally I have no objection to the consideration of the resolution——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the resolution was reported approximately 10 days ago by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It was discussed briefly at that time. The same suggestion which is now made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] was then made by another Senator. I should very much like to have the resolution disposed of. I hope the Senator from Indiana will not insist upon it going over.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Very well. Under the circumstances stated by the Senator from Arkansas, I shall not object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to ask has this resolution been referred to or considered by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads?

Mr. ROBINSON. It was considered by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and that committee conferred with the Committee on Civil Service in regard to the resolution, which, I think, would have jurisdiction of it. The resolution relates to the proceedings of the Civil Service Commission and has no especial application on its face to any particular department of the Government.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does it not deal particularly with the Post Office Department?

Mr. ROBINSON. It does not; it relates to all civil-service examinations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, the resolution has not been considered by any committee except the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Is that correct?

Mr. ROBINSON. That is true; but the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], who reported the resolution, conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service, who approved of the resolution with the amendment which has been reported by the Senator from New York.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think I shall object, but I wish to say that I think resolutions of this character ought to be referred to the committee having jurisdiction over the subject matter, irrespective of the question of the funds necessary to carry on the investigation. It is not in the province, as I understand, of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to go into the merits of resolutions of this character which are referred to it; the committee having jurisdiction over the subject matter should do that. I know the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads is interested in this resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Under the suggestion which has just been made by the Senator this resolution would have to go to almost all of the committees of the Senate, because it relates to the proceedings of the Civil Service Commission, which establishes eligibility for all of the departments of the Government. As I have said, the resolution has the approval of the chairman of the Committee on Civil Service, and I think, since it merely provides for an investigation, its reference to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate has afforded all the opportunity for inquiry that any committee may need to make respecting the subject.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am simply expressing my view as to what I think ought to be the general policy of the Senate with reference to resolutions providing for investigations. Of course, the resolution had to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate before any money could be paid out, but I think it ought to be the general practice of the Senate to refer such resolutions in the first instance to the committee having jurisdiction over the subject matter, so that we may have the benefit of their views as to whether or not the investigation ought to be made. Then, if they conclude that it should be entered upon, it is proper to refer the resolution to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to determine whether the money should be provided.

Referring briefly to the suggestion of the Senator, the Committee on Civil Service would probably be the proper committee to deal with the matter, as it relates to all of the departments of the Government. With that statement, Mr. President, I am not going to object to the present consideration of the resolution, because I understand it has been reported from the committee and has been on the table for two or three weeks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendment which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "documents," to insert "except those that have been received by the commission under pledge of confidence," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators, who shall be members of the Committee on Civil Service, be appointed by the President of the Senate, and the said committee is hereby authorized and instructed to investigate the proceedings of the examining division of the Civil Service Commission; and particularly to ascertain whether political influence has been used in said examinations and in the making and alteration of grades relating to the same, and whether the act of Congress giving preference to ex-service men in appointment to office under civil-service regulation has been observed and executed.

Said committee is empowered to sit during the recess and sessions of the Senate, at such times and places as by it may be deemed advisable, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of witnesses and the production of books, papers, and documents, except those that have been received by the commission under pledge of confidence, to administer oaths, and to employ stenographers at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, and such clerical assistance as may be necessary. All expenses of the committee incurred under this resolution shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers authorized by the committee and signed by the chairman thereof.

Said committee shall report its proceedings and findings to the Senate within 90 days.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to object, but if that procedure shall be followed it will not give us an opportunity even to scrutinize the various items of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The text of the bill will be read.

Mr. WARREN. The bill will be read just the same, but a double reading will be avoided.

Mr. KING. Very well; I shall offer no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Wyoming is granted.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Office of the Secretary," on page 2, line 2, after the numerals "$12,000," to insert:

Undersecretary of the Treasury, to be nominated by the President and appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $7,500 per annum and shall perform such duties in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury as may be prescribed by the Secretary or by law, and under the provisions of section 177, Revised Statutes, in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall perform the duties of the Secretary until a successor is appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease, $7,500.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming has the floor. Does he yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WARREN. I understand the Senator from New Jersey wishes to offer an amendment to the amendment, which, of course, is in order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to strike out "$7,500," in line 6, and insert "$10,000"; and, in line 12, to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$10,000."

The amendment applies to the salary fixed for the Undersecretary of the Treasury. The incumbent, Mr. Gilbert, comes from my State. He was appointed one of the Assistant Secretaries during the war; he is a man of considerable ability and has had a great deal of experience.

When the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, was appointed he immediately recognized that Mr. Gilbert could be of great assistance to him in relieving him of the many details that the Secretary of the Treasury has to assume. Mr. Gilbert was offered a position in the law firm of Mr. Cravath, in New York, at a considerably higher salary; but the Secretary of the Treasury urged him to stay in the service of the Government in the Treasury Department by reason of his experience, and the fact that he could be of assistance to the Secretary; and he suggested that Mr. Gilbert be made Undersecretary of the Treasury when that office was created, which is now a fact.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Gilbert is slated to take this place when this office is created?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand so; yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Gilbert was in the Treasury Department during the last administration, I suppose?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Yes; he was.

Mr. HARRISON. Can the Senator tell us what salary he received at that time?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know. It was much less than this; but his duties at present are much greater, and he had opportunity outside to make a great deal more money in the practice of law; and the Secretary feels that he should be paid a salary commensurate with his responsibilities and the work that he performs, and feels that it should be $10,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I had understood, and I thought perhaps the Senator was informed as to that, that Mr. Gilbert had been in the Treasury Department for quite a long while, and that he formerly received $2,400 a year. Does the Senator know about that?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not.

Mr. HARRISON. I am further informed that when this position of Undersecretary of the Treasury or Assistant Secretary of the Treasury was suggested by the present Secretary of the Treasury he wanted provision made for a salary of $10,000, and that he said it was necessary that that amount be appropriated to obtain the services of just such a man as was needed, and that he then lifted Mr. Gilbert from the salary of $2,000 or $2,400, which he was then receiving, to the salary he is now receiving.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Those may be the facts; but that has nothing to do with this situation, because Mr. Gilbert, coming to the Treasury Department as a young man, has shown marked ability, and the Secretary feels that he is worth this salary. More than that, if Mr. Gilbert decides to leave the Treasury and the public service, a place is waiting for him in one of the largest law firms in New York. I think the Secretary of the Treasury is anxious to keep a man of Mr. Gilbert's ability in the public service, and I feel also that it is a wise plan.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator whether, under the law, the Secretary of the Treasury has not now the right to name three Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury at salaries of $5,000 each?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think so; yes.

Mr. HARRISON. If it was so necessary to retain the services of Mr. Gilbert, who during the last administration was working for a much smaller salary, he could be appointed to one of those places, could he not?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator knows perfectly well that during the war men never considered the salary they were receiving. They served oftentimes from a sense of patriotic duty, and I think Mr. Gilbert was in that class. I know him.

Mr. HARRISON. No doubt; but Mr. Gilbert has been in the Government service for a number of years. As I understand, he has grown up in the service. He started at a very small salary and gradually was promoted to this place. I am just wondering if this is not merely a plan to put upon the taxpayers of the country a very large increase of salary and to create a new office, whereas if Mr. Gilbert was so necessary to the Secretary's office he could have been appointed to one of the positions of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury that are now provided by law.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. We will admit that Mr. Gilbert is exceptionally fitted for this position. I know that that is so, and he is a man of exceptional ability.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will the Senator wait until I finish?

Mr. HARRISON. I was just going to back up that statement by saying that I understand he is extraordinarily efficient, that he is thoroughly efficient and qualified.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator also knows that by reason of the after-the-war conditions the Treasury Department has great responsibilities and great burdens. The Secretary of the Treasury has the bond-refunding plan and the tariff to deal with, and all of the various responsibilities of the Treasury Department impose upon the Secretary great burdens; and he does need at his right hand an able man to help handle those problems. The Secretary of the Treasury feels that in Mr. Gilbert he has such a man. He desires him to have this position and also this salary.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. WARREN. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to say to the Senator that the House declined to put this Undersecretary of the Treasury in this bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think I owe the Senate a little explanation about this item.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should just like to make this statement: I am opposed to this proposed increase in salary. I am opposed to the creation of this position of Undersecretary of the Treasury at all. We did that once, I think, in the State Department. My impression is that we have left out the Undersecretary of the State Department. Now we want to put an Undersecretary in the Treasury Department, with three Assistant Secretaries already there. It is just another addition to the pay roll of the Treasury Department; and the committee proposed to name a salary of $7,500 for the Undersecretary, whereas now it is proposed to increase that to $10,000, and I presume next year there will be a proposal to increase it to $12,000 or $15,000. At any rate, I am against both propositions—both the committee amendment and the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey. I do not believe this Undersecretary of the Treasury is needed. If Mr. Gilbert is peculiarly qualified as an assistant in this department and is very helpful to the Secretary, let him take the position of Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; but the proposal here is to add another position and another salary, and I do not think it is justified at all.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think I ought not to let the Senator go on without an explanation.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am willing now to have the explanation.

Mr. WARREN. This is not a new place. It is a place that is already filled, and has been filled for nearly a year.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then we ought to abolish it, I think.

Mr. WARREN. We are abolishing another place immediately under this estimate, one that was created during the time of Mr. McAdoo, namely, assistant to the Secretary. It has been useful, probably, but we believe that at the present time, while there is a vacancy, they can do without the position.

The history of this position of Undersecretary is as follows:

Immediately after the present Secretary of the Treasury took the office he brought to the attention of the Congress the fact that he must have an Undersecretary, or one who could perform his duties in case of his absence. He recommended the position very highly and recommended the salary. It was put in an appropriation bill after the estimate came down in the regular way, and he appointed Mr. Gilbert, as has been said.

I do not know what salary Mr. Gilbert formerly got. I understood that he got $5,000 previously as Assistant Secretary, but I may be wrong about that. He is a man I should say about 35 years old, and there is no doubt that he is thoroughly competent. He was there under the former administration, perhaps even further back than the immediately preceding one.

The House put in the position, and put it in at $10,000, and endeavored to retain it in the bill; but having been put in originally in a deficiency bill, under the old rule the position must first be established by general law, and a Member from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made a point of order against the provision, which was sustained.

That is the history of the matter. It came to our committee with a very urgent letter from the Secretary himself, over his own signature, and besides by a messenger at another time, expressing great anxiety about the place, and the necessity of retaining it. Meantime, the Senate committee voted to reinstate it, not at $10,000, as the House had it, but at $7,500; and the Senate committee proposed, and the amendment will come up in a moment, to strike out the assistant to the Secretary, a position which, by the way, has been vacant for a little time because of other arrangements. Now, it is up to the point where the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] moves to raise the salary of $7,500 to $10,000, and the vote will come first upon that amendment.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming what salary is paid the Undersecretary of State?

Mr. WARREN. The Undersecretary of State is getting $7,500. The First Assistant Secretary of War gets $10,000. Those three are the ones who stand above the similar positions in other departments. There are only two undersecretaries, but the assistant secretaries generally, as a class, are receiving $5,000. The Secretaries of some of the departments have asked to have their first assistants paid $7,500. There is not any doubt in my mind that they ought to have that salary, but we have not raised any salary whatever at any place in this bill, and the matter of $7,500 must not be considered as a raise by us. It is simply substituting $7,500, less $5,000, which amounts to only $2,500, in place of the $15,000 for the two men placed in the bill by the House.

Mr. KENYON. I am wondering, if we raise this salary to $10,000, whether it will not be necessary, as a matter of justice, to raise the salary of the Undersecretary of State to the same figure.

Mr. WARREN. That will be a matter for future consideration. Of course, it has been considered heretofore that the duties in the Treasury Department, which are so heavy, are more important, and became even more important after the war than during the war because of the tremendous volume of claims, and the change of currency, notes, and so forth, and the putting out and taking in of new securities, and so forth.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, why can not this position of assistant to the Secretary be tendered to Mr. Gilbert, since it seems to be necessary to retain Mr. Gilbert, and since he is so important to the proper conduct of the business of the office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and a new office must be made for him? I do not question his qualifications at all. I do not know Mr. Gilbert, but I assume that the Senator is entirely correct in what he says about him.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me right there, the matter of Mr. Gilbert's name comes to me only incidentally. When the Secretary of the Treasury asked for the creation of this office we knew nothing about whom it was to go to, and we only know whom it went to by the business that we have done since. Of course, the provision in the present bill may apply to him and it may not.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it is entirely immaterial who is in contemplation. What I am objecting to is the creation of a new office with a new salary. Why can not Mr. Gilbert be assistant to the Secretary? Why is it necessary to change the House bill, to strike out the Assistant to the Secretary and to put in an undersecretary instead? The idea seems to be that an Undersecretary is more important than an Assistant Secretary and entitled to more pay, and I take it that that is the reason for giving him the new title. It is not necessary to have an undersecretary in order to have somebody perform the duties of the Secretary during his absence or illness or incapacity. An assistant to the Secretary can do that, or one of the Assistant Secretaries can do it.

There is no necessity for creating a new position and giving it a new and more dignified name in order to have somebody perform the duties of the Secretary when he is incapacitated or absent.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. FLETCHER. I can not see why we can not keep the place of Assistant Secretary at $5,000, instead of striking that out and putting in the position of Undersecretary at $7,500, which it is proposed now to raise to $10,000. It is simply a means of increasing somebody's pay and giving the position a new title in order to justify that increase. That is what it looks like.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator is in error when he says it is increasing somebody's pay. Mr. Gilbert occupied the position of Undersecretary for the past year, and last year's appropriation act provided a salary of $10,000 for the Undersecretary of the Treasury. He has been receiving that for the past year. The committee propose a reduction in his salary to make it $7,500. I want to call the Senator's attention to the testimony of Secretary Mellon. The chairman asked Mr. Mellon in regard to Mr. Gilbert:

> Mr. Secretary, will you please tell us how the position of Undersecretary is functioning, and whether it is of any advantage in the conduct of the department, or as much advantage as you anticipated it would be?

Secretary Mellon replied:

> Yes, sir; it is of very great importance. The position is general instead of being special to the different bureaus, and there are matters of general import that have to be taken care of which the Undersecretary can handle and relieve the Secretary to that extent. Then it is desirable, in the absence of the Secretary, to have one who will have the general authority to handle whatever business comes in.

You can do what you please with this proposition, but we are legislating to provide a staff for a very important department, with great responsibilities at this time, and I think the Senate ought to consider somewhat the recommendations of the Secretary of the Treasury, who desires efficient help and efficient assistance, and we should not try to cut the salaries down to such an extent that the Secretary can not procure the help he needs and desires at this time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am emphatically opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey. I do not think we ought to provide in this bill for a salary for the Undersecretary of the Treasury double the salary of an assistant secretary. There will be no trouble about getting a proper man for the place, in my judgment. Furthermore, I do not think we ought to make provision for this in view of the proposal for a reclassification of salaries. If we should provide for an undersecretary or an assistant secretary at this salary it can be cared for in that bill, and all the various conditions can be taken into account.

The argument presented here in behalf of an increase in this salary has been urged time and again before the Committee on Appropriations with reference to various offices, various positions, and various salaries paid by the Government. We have refused to accede to that argument, although we may recognize the merit of it, and we have refused largely because it would involve increases in the salaries of a great many employees of the Government without regard to their relation to the other employees of the Government.

Personally I do not like the word "undersecretary." I would much prefer the language "first assistant secretary," if we must have one of these gentlemen getting higher pay than the others; but the majority of the committee were in favor of using the term "undersecretary," and I acquiesced in their judgment, and I will stand by it. But the recommendation of the committee of a salary of $7,500 is liberal to the fullest extent, taking into account the fact that there are three Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury who get only $5,000 a year apiece. So, Mr. President, I hope the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey raising it to $10,000 will be voted down.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to say to the Senator that if this amendment is adopted, in view of the fact that it will create the position of undersecretary, the more "undersecretary" he is the more overpay we will give him. Is that the idea?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; I suppose the more "under" he gets the more pay he will get. I just want to say, too, that if we continue this practice of providing for these positions of undersecretary there will not be a Cabinet officer who will not come in here asking for an undersecretary, and if we grant the request of this one and the request of that one, what reason can we give for not granting it to the others who may ask for it? That is an additional reason why we at any rate should not provide this salary of $10,000 a year. Seven thousand five hundred dollars is ample, especially in view of what we provide for the Assistant Secretaries.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator understand that the Undersecretary of the Treasury has had $10,000 in the past year, and that it was provided in the appropriation act for this year?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, the sooner we end it the better it will be for the Government. This continues it for another year, does not make it permanent legislation, and, in my judgment, we ought to stop it right here.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, in view of the statement made by the Senator from New Jersey that this office had been in existence for a year or more——

Mr. KING. For less than a year.

Mr. SMITH. Or less than a year, at the rate of $10,000—I would like to ask the chairman of the committee, for information, under what provision of law Mr. Gilbert was appointed as Undersecretary? I believe that is the terminology which the Senator from New Jersey used.

Mr. WARREN. It was placed in the first deficiency bill, and this was the provision:

> Undersecretary of the Treasury, to be nominated by the President and appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $10,000 per annum, and shall perform such duties in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury as may be prescribed by the Secretary or by law, and under the provisions of section 177, Revised Statutes, in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall perform the duties of the Secretary until a successor is appointed, or such absence or sickness shall cease.

Mr. SMITH. That was passed at what time?

Mr. WARREN. That was for the fiscal year 1922, which, of course, will run until the 30th of next June. This was approved June 16, 1921.

Mr. SMITH. So that Mr. Gilbert has been serving in that capacity practically from June 16, 1921?

Mr. WARREN. He has.

Mr. SMITH. And the name of the office has been "Undersecretary of the Treasury"?

Mr. WARREN. He was appointed and confirmed in the usual way.

Mr. SMITH. And he has received, up until the present time, a salary of $10,000?

Mr. WARREN. And he will receive that salary until the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. SMITH. I have not been keeping up with this matter, but I see that the House provided for an Assistant Secretary at $5,000. When this Undersecretary was provided for by law in June, 1921, did that office supersede the office of the Assistant Secretary, which the House had stricken out, or were there four assistants in addition to the other Secretary?

Mr. WARREN. There were at least three besides one called assistant to the Secretary. It did not disturb those at all.

Mr. SMITH. So the House has amended by striking out the assistant. As I understand it, there has been an assistant to the Secretary, and three Assistant Secretaries, in addition to the Undersecretary, until the present time.

Mr. WARREN. There were three Assistant Secretaries, besides the Undersecretary, and besides an officer called "Assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. SMITH. That would make, in effect, four assistants to the Secretary of the Treasury up to the present time, starting with June 16, 1921, in addition to the Undersecretary?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. The House modified that by striking out the Assistant to the Secretary and providing for an Undersecretary and three assistants?

Mr. WARREN. No. The House committee constructed their bill precisely as the law provides now, and with the same officers precisely, but on the floor this one particular item providing for an Undersecretary, together with the language providing for his salary, was stricken out on a point of order raised by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SMITH. So that if this Undersecretary shall be provided for, we will have an Undersecretary, an Assistant to the Secretary, and three Assistant Secretaries?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will notice, immediately following this item, that there is an amendment to vacate the position of Assistant to the Secretary.

Mr. SMITH. So that would leave the Undersecretary and three assistants?

Mr. WARREN. It would leave the Undersecretary and three assistants.

Mr. SMITH. That, then, would remove a $5,000 salary, which was carried in the previous bill, and add $2,500 for the Undersecretary?

Mr. WARREN. No; it will take out one $5,000 position, and it will reduce the $10,000 provided for the Undersecretary to $7,500. A total of $7,500 will be taken out if both of the amendments are agreed to as the committee reported them.

Mr. SMITH. The point I wanted to get at was this: The total increase, then, in the expenses incurred in providing for three assistants and the Undersecretary, would be $2,500 in excess of what it would be if it was left as the House has it?

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator means as the House has stricken it out on the point of order, it simply leaves four at $5,000, and if this amendment of the committee prevails, there will be one less at $5,000, and there will be one more at $7,500, which would make an addition of $2,500; but the total would be $7,500 less than was carried in the bill as reported by the House committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey, as well as the committee amendment; and my opposition is in spite of the fact that they need some efficient help up in the Treasury Department to see that that department is administered properly.

Mr. President, if there is a department in the Government that needs efficient men it is the Treasury Department, and I do not know of a gentleman more qualified by training and fitness to do the work of the Secretary of the Treasury than Mr. Gilbert. He started in at a very small salary, has been in the Treasury Department for quite a long while, worked up from $1,200 to $1,500, and $2,000, but under this administration they have raised his salary from $2,000 or approximately that amount, for which he worked so long, to $10,000.

It is but in keeping, however, with the general policy of the present administration, and I say that in the best of humor and commiserate with the Senators on the other side. We have not forgotten how the Shipping Board took men who had been working for $6,500 for several years and are now paying them $35,000 and $20,000, and $15,000 a year. So this increased salary is in line with the present general policy of taking persons who were receiving, under the last administration, $2,000 or $2,400, and now increasing their salaries to $7,500, $10,000, or much higher——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. HARRISON. Does the Senator desire to ask me a question?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to ask the Senator to include the cost of the merchant marine built under the previous administration, and what it is worth at the present prices.

Mr. HARRISON. I would include that because we built a very wonderful merchant marine, and I would include the statement, too, that under the present management they are selling ships that cost us thousands on thousands of dollars for $2,100 each; and it will be very difficult for them to explain the fact how, when they went to employ counsel to defend suits which were filed against the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, they went to New York and consulted in some instances the members of the firm which had pending suits against the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and accepted their recommendation as to the employment of attorneys out of their offices to defend those suits.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator should also investigate the employment of and fees paid to certain lawyers during the previous administration.

Mr. HARRISON. Ah, well; they were quite reasonable. This is the second appropriation bill reported out of the Committee on Appropriations. The first was a deficiency bill that carried over $100,000,000, and in this second appropriation bill we find that salaries are to be increased. Are we never to stop passing deficiency bills and creating new officers and increasing salaries? We have heard enough of economy to practice a little of it. Certainly this is a most appropriate time.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not believe the Senator means exactly that.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I meant exactly what I said.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to make a brief statement?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. This is the first appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1923.

Mr. HARRISON. But we passed a deficiency bill here during this Congress.

Mr. WARREN. The deficiency bill was for the year 1922.

Mr. HARRISON. But it was during this Congress and carried an appropriation of over $100,000,000 as a deficiency.

Mr. WARREN. It did. On the point of increasing salaries, I think I am correct in stating there is not a single salary increased in the entire bill which we are now considering, so that in starting the fiscal year 1923, while the Senator may indulge in anticipation, he has nothing yet on which to base his statement. The bill does not propose a raise in salaries.

Mr. HARRISON. Here are the facts, and if I state them incorrectly I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for whom I have very high regard, will correct me.

The Secretary of the Treasury, as soon as he was inducted into office, went before the House Appropriations Committee and said he needed an undersecretary or assistant and asked for an appropriation to be made of $10,000 so he could employ that particular person. He did not state to the committee, which evidently was what he had in mind at that time, that he intended to appoint Mr. Gilbert. On that deficiency bill they appropriated $10,000 to cover that one year. He pleaded to the committee that it was because of the extraordinary situation, the abnormal condition that was then confronting the Treasury Department, that he needed a man at that particular time for the work.

The committee did not attempt to make it a permanent office. There was no suggestion to the Committee on Appropriations to make it a permanent office, and this is the first attempt to make it a permanent office. That appropriation of $10,000 was to expire at the end of this fiscal year. It was incorrectly carried in the deficiency bill, for it was not a deficiency——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. This proposition is to make it a permanent office, which was not attempted to be done before. I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say to the Senator that I never heard of this matter until I came on the floor of the Senate a little while ago, but I seem to remember that Mr. Gilbert was appointed under the last administration as Assistant Secretary at a salary of $5,000.

Mr. HARRISON. In the closing days of the last administration.

Mr. LODGE. I do not care whether it was in the closing days or the beginning days——

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator is right.

Mr. LODGE. He was appointed Assistant Secretary at a salary of $5,000 a year.

Mr. HARRISON. I think he took Mr. Leffingwell's place as Assistant Secretary at $5,000 a year.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I thought.

Mr. HARRISON. He has proven himself to be a most efficient gentleman, thoroughly competent, who had before that time received as high as $2,400. I desire, Mr. President, at this time to call attention to an article that appeared in yesterday afternoon's paper, I think in the Daily News. I have seen it carried in other papers. This article seems to have been headed:

Harding's plan is halted. Opposition blocks Harding's reorganization scheme.

Then at the bottom of the article it is said:

The first serious opposition to reorganization suggestions is found in Congress, where every department and bureau head has at least a handful of active friends fighting for him.

As soon as this administration took office the suggestion was made that there should be a reorganization of the bureaus of the Government, a weeding out of surplus offices, a reduction of salaries, that efficiency might be promoted and a saving effected to the American people. A propaganda to carry out that plan was started in the country. A joint resolution was passed by the House and the Senate directing the appointment of a joint commission on reorganization. Three Senators were appointed and three Members of the House were appointed.

Then the suggestion came from the White House that there should be cooperation between the Executive and the legislative branches and a desire that the resolution be amended so that he might designate some one as his personal representative to cooperate with the congressional commission. Congress accordingly did that. I did not believe at that time that it was a wise policy, because Congress was undertaking the job, and should be permitted to do it without delay or Executive embarrassment.

That commission had a meeting along in the latter part of March. It had another meeting on April 6 of last year. It is almost a year now since it met. I say to you, Mr. President, and I say to the country that the reorganization commission which was empowered by Congress to go to work, weed out useless offices, reduce salaries if necessary, coordinate and reorganize the bureaus of the Government, has never held a meeting from that day to this. No suggestion has come to the Congress as to what that commission is doing.

I speak by the card, because I happen to be a humble member of that commission. There has been no call for a meeting; there has been no conference upon the part of the members of the commission, and the insinuation that evidently came from the White House that Congress is blocking the plans of President Harding in this great reorganization scheme is absolutely and utterly false.

I have had no one in any of the departments approach me on the subject and try to block any plan. The delay has been caused by some one other than Members of Congress on the commission. What ought to happen is that the chairman of the commission should call it together and inform the members about his preliminary survey. We should get to work. We should have hearings and try to put in effect this great reorganization plan that was advertised 12 months ago as the cure for existing ills, so the plan could be laid before the Congress and the reorganization scheme put on its feet.

I have risen in the main to counteract the impression that might have been created by the article to which I have referred and other articles that are appearing in print. If they have differences in the departments, between the Army and the Navy, for instance, as to coordination, the President should get them together. If he can not, then let the commission meet, have hearings, get all the facts, and make their recommendations to Congress, so that Congress can do something.

I desire to say, too, that the commission has made no findings touching the coordination of the Army and Navy Departments of the Government, and so far as I know the only one who has a fixed purpose about it is Mr. Brown, the personal representative of the President on the commission. Of course, the commission may, after it has had full hearings, recommend that plan, but it has not even discussed it up to this good hour. So far as establishing a public welfare bureau, it has taken no action, nor has it acted on any of the other very great problems that the commission thought it would investigate and consider and upon which it would make its recommendations.

It would seem to me that instead of these articles, that one being issued or inspired from the White House or the personal representative of the President, Mr. Brown, who is the chairman of the commission, thereby creating an impression in the country that this department will be coordinated with that department, the chairman should call the commission together and allow the members representing the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States to begin their work, so that they can pass judgment upon the problem.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator why the commission have refrained from engaging in the work which they were charged to perform?

Mr. HARRISON. I could not explain that. It is inexplicable. Of course, the Senator understands I am merely a minority member of the commission and that Mr. Brown, the personal representative of the President, was made chairman of the commission over my protest, because I suggested that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] should be chairman of the commission. I do not know and can give no explanation in the world.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether Mr. Brown, because he is chairman, is superior to the commission and prevents their meeting? I should like to inquire, further, if he refuses to call them together, whether it is the purpose of the commission to continue this policy of inaction indefinitely?

Mr. HARRISON. I think the commission should be called together, and if Mr. Brown as chairman does not call the commission, it is my opinion that one of the members of the commission belonging to the majority party should call it together and we should fix our program and go to work.

Mr. KING. Would it not be a good idea to offer a resolution discharging the commission from further service if they are not to act, and appointing a commission that will act?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it would be very appropriate that that should be done.

Mr. KING. I suggest that the Senator from Mississippi offer a resolution discharging the commission from further consideration of the work which they were charged to perform, and that we appoint a commission that will act. If Mr. Brown, because he is the President's appointee, declines to act and declines to call the commission together, it seems to me we had better appoint another commission.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Senator is exactly right, and if something is not done very soon about calling the commission together, so we can get a preliminary survey of what, if anything, has been done, I shall offer a motion to discharge the commission, so that another one may be appointed.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that we have a reclassification bill before us, and my understanding was that the reorganization was to be effected at a very early date, and then that was to be followed by the reclassification bill. That would be the orderly method of procedure, to determine the various organizations in the executive department of the Government, and then, after having determined those organizations, fix the personnel and permit the reclassification bill to provide for the classes and for the compensation to be allowed. But it seems to me as though we are, in halting the work of reorganization, offering an insuperable obstacle to a proper reclassification bill.

Mr. HARRISON. There is certainly very much of an impression going out that Congress is halting the work of the reorganization commission when Congress is not halting the work of the commission at all.

Mr. JONES of Washington obtained the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I just entered the Chamber, and do not know the source of the information of the Senator from Mississippi on which he bases the statement that Congress is halting the reorganization work.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator was not here when I read an article which appeared in yesterday's afternoon paper. It is headed:

Harding's plan is halted. Opposition blocks Harding's reorganization scheme.

It closes with the following statement:

The first serious opposition to reorganization suggestions is found in Congress, where every department and bureau head has at least a handful of active friends fighting for him.

The article gives that impression throughout.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator frankly that there is no foundation for that conclusion.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator will also state that the propaganda sent out to the effect that the commission is doing this and doing that should not go to the country, when, in fact, the commission has not met since April of last year and has made no findings whatever.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Mississippi is correct as to the meeting of the commission, but at the last meeting of the commission, Mr. Brown, the chairman of the commission, was authorized to prepare a plan and when that plan was complete to report to the committee. I myself thought at the time that it was rather a sweeping power to grant to any one member of the commission, no limit being placed as to the time when the report should be made, but that was the action of the commission.

I wish to say that, in my opinion—I am not informed as to whether the status has changed within the last two or three weeks—there are two or three very serious questions to be solved, and I think before they are finally solved the President of the United States will have to pass upon them. I refer to the question of difference between the heads of some of the departments.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator think that the commission ought to pass on them before anything is finally done?

Mr. SMOOT. I think we instructed Mr. Brown to report to us as to those questions.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand.

Mr. SMOOT. And Mr. Brown is trying to bring all of the interested parties into accord in order that he may report to the committee a unison of opinion on the part of the heads of all departments of our Government as to the plan that he shall submit.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not the Senator think, since the commission was over a year ago empowered by Congress to get to work, that it really ought to have some meetings and hearings and do something? If there are differences between the departments of the Government, that is of no concern to Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I will frankly say to the Senator from Mississippi that I had expected a report would have been made before this time, but—and I say it with deference to the head of every department and of every division and to those under them who, through the proper channels, are objecting—to prepare for the committee in a completed form such a plan of reorganization as is desired is a great undertaking. The Senator from Mississippi will remember that, as I have already stated upon the floor of the Senate, unless there could be harmony between the heads of the different departments, the President and Congress, nothing would come out of these reorganization plans. That is exactly what my idea has been in the past, and it is what I believe to-day. During several past administrations I have seen such an effort made several times, not as a whole, but in piecemeal——

Mr. HARRISON. That, of course, is no secret.

Mr. SMOOT. And it has been an entire failure in that way at all times. I will say to the Senator I think the time has now arrived when the various departments must come to some agreement.

Mr. HARRISON. I am glad to hear the Senator from Utah say that.

Mr. SMOOT. If an agreement can not be reached, then I desire that a report shall be made to the joint committee, and that the committee shall decide upon the course to pursue, and then report to Congress, for the ultimate result of this proposal must be left, of course, to Congress.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely desire to speak for a moment.

Mr. KING. Is what the Senator intends to say apropos of the question we are now discussing?

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is.

Mr. KING. Then, of course, I defer to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say merely a few words. I sympathize very much with the criticism of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the suggestions that he has made. I do not believe that there is a more important question confronting the administration than the reorganization of the various departments of the Government. That has been presented as one of the great objects that the administration expects to accomplish. I hope that it will be accomplished, but about the only way, so far as I can see, that it can be brought about is for the President to insist upon his Cabinet officers getting together and agreeing as to the distribution of the various departmental activities and simply to tell them that they must reach an agreement. The Cabinet officer who is not willing to cooperate with his fellow Cabinet officers and make concessions and see to it that duplications are avoided should be disciplined in some way by the President of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator from Washington if it is absolutely necessary to have an agreement between the heads of the different departments?

If the commission, through Mr. Brown, its chairman, shall see fit to devise a plan of reorganization, note the duplications, and note the extra service that could be eliminated, and all that, could not Congress act on it without reference to the department heads?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Technically it is not necessary, but practically, in my judgment, it is necessary, because, as the Senator from Florida knows, if particular Cabinet officers are not in favor of a certain line of action by Congress when we attempt to carry out what we think possibly ought to be done, if it is contrary to the wishes of such Cabinet officers, they will have their representatives from the various bureaus and departments that may be affected coming to Congress and entreating Senators to do this and to do that. That is why it makes it practically impossible, though technically it is not impossible, and technically Congress will have the last say in the matter.

Mr. FLETCHER. I recognize that difficulty, but if the commission can present to Congress reasons for their recommendations, backed by a man of experience who has analyzed the whole situation, and who can give the reason for his recommendations, I think the opposition of the Cabinet officers will vanish.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not want the Senate to understand that I do not think the commission should make any report until the Cabinet officers get together. What I am suggesting is what I think is the practical course in order to arrive at a decision and to reach an agreement; that is, for the President to direct his Cabinet officers, first, to acquaint themselves with the various activities of the different bureaus, then to get around the table and discuss the matter and try to arrange a program that will do away with duplications. If, however, each head of a department is going to depend upon his bureau chiefs, and so on, of course they will never get together and we shall never get rid of this duplication. To use a very common expression, it is necessary to take the bull by the horns and act in these matters. If after they have tried to do that there are still disagreements amongst them, then I believe in the commission getting together, finding what they have done and how far they have gone, what the duties are of the various offices, and then, if necessary, without their agreement, to make their recommendation to Congress. In my judgment, however, that will not be necessary, for I hardly believe there will be a division of opinion.

I have no doubt about the President's earnestness and sincerity in this matter, but with the multitude of duties he must perform and the obligations which are placed upon him I can not wonder that some of these matters may not be pressed as vigorously as I think they ought to be pressed; but if the President should tell his Cabinet officers that they must agree upon a plan for the reorganization of the departments of the Government, that plan will be agreed upon; it will be submitted to the commission; in my judgment it will meet with its approval, will come to Congress, and will pass without very much opposition. The more opposition there is on the outside, however, the more difficult it will be and the more doubtful the action by the Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I quite agree with all that the Senator from Washington has said, and I am sure that the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] will agree with me that it is very difficult, indeed, to report a bill to the Senate or to the House of Representatives to which one or more departments of the Government are bitterly opposed. As an indication of that difficulty, I only have to call attention to the fact that we have tried for years and years to pass through the Senate a bill amending the printing laws. We have had before us such a measure year after year. The reports, as I have stated on the floor of the Senate time and time again, show that if enacted into law such a bill would bring about a saving of between $800,000 and $900,000 a year; but because of the fact that former Public Printers have opposed it for the reason that it took certain appointments out of their hands, I have seen Senators object to it for all kinds of flimsy excuses. I know that employees of the Printing Office have been up here and have visited nearly every Senator they could reach. So we have not been able to pass that bill up to this day.

If it be possible, when the reorganization committee have agreed upon a bill and reported it to the Senate, I earnestly hope that it will be in such shape that there will not be half dozen of the departments calling upon their friends, perhaps, and asking them to oppose it and thwart it in every way.

I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that the question has been under consideration by the joint committee for a long time, and yet I must say that there has been a great deal accomplished toward the final completion of the work, and I am hopeful that it will not be many days longer until the final report shall be submitted.

This is the only place where objection can be made to the delay, because the commission itself practically took the matter out of its hands as to the time when the report should be made, but I now voice my hope that it will not be many more days until the matter is brought to a head and a report submitted by the chairman to the commission, so that we may get to work.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that while the commission, in effect delegated their authority to the chairman of the commission and failed to limit him as to the time in which he should submit a report back to the commission as a whole, still it is in the power of the commission to meet and to call upon the chairman to make that report without further delay. I submit it is not entirely out of their hands.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct as to that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I am sure he will agree with me that no member of the commission ever dreamed that it would take this long for a report to be prepared and submitted. Mr. Brown was authorized to prepare his preliminary reports and submit them to the commission, but there was nothing said about his preparing an entire plan and then submitting it, because after the report is made to the commission I take it that the commission will hold hearings and go into the question fully, so that their findings will be based upon a full investigation and consideration of the question. So it would seem to me that the commission should be called together, and, if a full report is not ready to be made, that a partial report should be made to the commission so that we may proceed with the work in hand.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think this is the second time we have discussed this question upon the floor of the Senate. I repeat the hope heretofore expressed that the whole plan will be submitted to the commission in a very few days and that the plan as submitted will have the united support of the heads of all the departments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I can appreciate the delicacy of the commission in dealing with this question. In view of the fact that the President of the United States—and perhaps quite properly—has a personal representative upon the commission, I can understand that the commission would feel like yielding to him in many respects, particularly in dealing with the preliminary matters; and yet I can not help but feel that a mistake was made by the President of the United States in seeking either to take the matter out of the hands of Congress or to influence or curb the activities of the legislative commission appointed to discharge this important task.

Speaking for myself, I have such confidence in my colleague [Mr. SMOOT], in the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and in my good friend the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] that I would have preferred to leave the matter to them, with such committee as might be appointed by the House of Representatives, than to leave it to Mr. Brown or any other person who might be brought into contact with the commission. The Senators whom I have mentioned—and I think the same thing may be said of the Members of the House—are very familiar with legislative matters, with the organization of the Government, and with the departments. They know where economies may be effectuated. Mr. Brown was a stranger, he was not an executive, nor had he been a member of the legislative branch of the Government. So he had to begin at the bottom to learn the executive and administrative problems which were involved in this great work of reorganization. I have been surprised to learn that the commission have not functioned better than they have functioned. I am surprised that the commission have left so much authority to Mr. Brown, because my colleague and the Senator from New York and the Senator from Mississippi, with their long legislative experience and their devotion to economy, in my opinion, could have done more work and done it better than it has been done, or could have been done, by Mr. Brown.

I think my colleague expects too much of the executive departments. They are all jealous of authority; they are not going to yield; and the only way in which economies can be effectuated in the executive departments is by legislative action. If we leave it to the executives to formulate a plan for reorganization and to determine the personnel and the compensation, there never will be reforms and there never will be economies. Congress must deal with this question, and the sooner we learn that fact the better it will be.

I most respectfully suggest to the commission that they immediately take the matter in hand and proceed with the important work which has been assigned to them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gooding	McKellar	Shortridge

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, getting back to the discussion of the pending amendment, I shall feel compelled to vote for the amendment of the committee and against the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], but I think I ought to say that the gentleman who now occupies the position of Undersecretary of the Treasury—whether he be a Democrat or a Republican, I do not know—is, in my judgment, one of the most extraordinarily competent men in the public service. He has charge of all the fiscal affairs of the United States Treasury, and he has shown himself through a series of years almost indispensable to the Treasury. Of course no man is indispensable, but he is almost indispensable. If the Secretary of the Treasury himself is worth $12,000 a year—which is about sufficient to pay his house rent in Washington—this Undersecretary of the Treasury is certainly worth the sum reported by the committee, because he does more actual work in any day of the week than the Secretary of the Treasury himself does in any entire week.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana (when Mr. CURTIS's name was called). I desire to announce that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is detained on official business. If present, he would vote against the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK];

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY]; and

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN].

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 51, as follows:

So Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be defeated. During these times of financial distress throughout the Nation, when it is necessary for all of the private business concerns of the country to practice every retrenchment possible, I do not feel that we, representing the Government, should be creating new offices and imposing additional burdens upon the American taxpayers.

We have heard a good deal about economy, and the good intentions of the present administration to practice economy, and to relieve, as far as possible, the burdens of those who maintain our Government; but I submit that these good intentions will be but empty promises if the Senate is to persist in creating new offices and increasing salaries.

We recall that some two months ago we had under consideration the question of creating some new offices and allowing fabulous, ridiculous, excessive salaries to those connected with the Shipping Board, and at that time a majority of the Senate seemed to agree with this increase of Government expenditures. It seems that in the wake of the precedent established then by a majority of the Senate that this was the time for creating new offices and increasing salaries; there is now a desire to perpetuate the policy which was inaugurated at that time.

The House declined to authorize this additional office at any salary. However, we find that the Senate committee, acceding to the wishes of the Secretary of the Treasury—and, by the way, the Secretary of the Treasury likes to herald throughout the country that this is an administration of economy—acceding to his wishes, they bring in the amendment proposing to create this additional office at a salary of $7,500 a year. Not content with the committee action, the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] comes and pleads with the Senate to fix the salary of this new office at $10,000 a year.

Since almost the first days of my service in this body I have witnessed a disposition on the part of quite a number, at least, to cut the salaries of those who are receiving a mere pittance for their services, but in contrast to that spirit of economy which seems to actuate some of these gentlemen in dealing with the salary of the person who is making probably not more than $1,200, $1,500, or $1,800 a year, when it comes to the question of dealing with the larger salaries we find that they reverse their position, and almost invariably favor increases in salary. It is high time that we should perform and make good the expressions of good intentions along the line of economy.

The American people are observing the action of Congress, and we must not fool ourselves and think that when we send out a statement broadcast over the country that the expenditures of the Government have been reduced hundreds of millions of dollars the public will accept that statement, especially in view of the fact that the history of the policy of the present Congress has disproved that those amounts have been saved.

In my opinion, it is necessary for Congress to deal courageously with this salary question. Think of the astounding and appalling condition which has been brought to the attention and to the notice of the public regarding the salaries being paid by the Federal reserve banks, more particularly the one in New York. Salaries have been increased 100 per cent, 200 per cent, 300 per cent, 400 per cent, and probably in some instances as much as 500 or 600 per cent. We find in the schedule of increases in salaries that men who had been receiving salaries of only $1,800 a year have had their salaries increased to $4,000 a year; men who had been receiving salaries of $3,000 a year have had their salaries increased probably to $10,000 or $12,000, and those salaries necessarily are paid from the earnings of the bank, which are due to the discount rate that is permitted. Yet although we profess a desire to institute and practice economy we have placed no restrictions upon them in the matter of fabulous salaries.

In my experience in dealing with the public affairs in a State government I found that there was always somebody knocking at the door wanting a salary increase; that there was always an effort, at least, to present a very plausible case, just as it has been urged here, that on account of the efficiency required and skill necessary in this very important position we will have to fix the salary at an amount commensurate with the services of the person who would be called into the position. Sometimes the salary is increased. When it is increased, almost invariably the same man who was filling the position at a far lower salary enjoys the increase.

During these times of financial depression in the country, when thousands and even millions of men who are willing to work, men who desire employment, are walking the streets of our cities in idleness, and in many instances hungry and half clad, we must try to do something to save the American people from the burdens of excessive taxation which can be inflicted upon them by a spirit of extravagance and recklessness in dealing with their Public Treasury.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 848.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. WARREN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa is entitled to the floor on the unfinished business. Does he yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I assume the Senator in charge of the unfinished business desires to resume the consideration of that bill. If so, I can only give notice that at the earliest opportunity I shall again seek to bring up the appropriation bill we have just been considering.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. CUMMINS. In view of the fact that we are about to change from the consideration of the appropriation bill to the consideration of the so-called mileage bill, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hale	McNary	Simmons
Cameron	Harreld	Moses	Smith
Capper	Harris	Nelson	Smoot
Caraway	Heflin	Newberry	Spencer
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Sterling
Cummins	Kellogg	Oddie	Swanson

Glass	McKellar	Sheppard	Watson, Ind.
Gooding	McKinley	Shields

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. CUMMINS resumed and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. The speech entire is as follows:

Wednesday, January 18, 1922.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I always listen to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], not only with great pleasure but with great profit. I think he discusses any question with distinguished fairness and clearness, and I am sorry that I feel compelled to dissent from some of the conclusions to which he has arrived. For a long time during his service upon the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate I think all the members of that committee learned to lean upon him for information and advice, and I for one acknowledge in this public way my very great obligation to the Senator from Arkansas for the work that he has performed in connection with this important and vital subject.

I think I ought to say another word, in a preliminary way, so that my position with regard to the general subject may not be misunderstood. I believe in the system of mileage books or tickets; I believe that form of transportation with respect to a great many people is exceedingly convenient. I think that the practice of issuing mileage books in this country ought to be resumed, and I have no doubt whatever that the Interstate Commerce Commission, when vested with the power, which it has not now, in my opinion, to require railroad companies to issue interchangeable mileage books, will speedily make the necessary order.

The question, however, with regard to the difference which shall be established between the ordinary ticket and the mileage book is a question upon which we are not qualified to express a judgment. While the Senator from Arkansas has paid me a very great compliment, which I deeply appreciate, I want to say in all candor that even though I have studied this subject for many years it would be utterly impossible for me, with the information I have, to determine what should be the difference, if any, as between the ordinary ticket for a specific journey and the mileage book good for any journey.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand the Senator from Iowa, he says that he is in favor of a return to the system of mileage tickets, but he also states his difficulty in determining that matter for himself. What would the Senator do about it—merely specifically authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to require the issuance of mileage tickets?

Mr. CUMMINS. I would authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to require the issuance of mileage tickets precisely as that commission is authorized to establish any other joint rates, and to require the issuance of a ticket not for the specific journey that is to be made but for general journeys, good everywhere upon any railroad within the jurisdiction of that body.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator from Iowa has made the statement, in which I was much interested, that the Interstate Commerce Commission is now without authority to do what he suggests.

Mr. CUMMINS. The commission so believes and I so believe.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has stated that the commission is divided about half and half on the proposition. I should like to ask him, if the Senator from Iowa can not answer the question, does that mean the commission is divided half and half on the question as to their right or authority or as to the question of policy?

Mr. ROBINSON. My information is that the commission is divided upon both questions and is very nearly equally divided upon them, particularly upon the question of policy.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator from Iowa is so eminently qualified to speak upon this question that I am loath even to intrude my opinion upon him or upon the Senate, but my impression all the time has been that while the Interstate Commerce Commission had full authority to require the railroads to issue mileage books they were divided on the question of the policy of doing so. Of course, I may be in error about that.

Mr. ROBINSON. I know that some members of the Interstate Commerce Commission think the commission has such power. I do not know whether any other members of the commission believe it has not such power.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, it is my judgment that the commission has not the power. The mere power to establish reasonable rates for passenger travel does not give the commission the power to require one railroad to sell tickets which are good all over the United States. I am sure that that must be the conclusion of most lawyers who have examined the matter.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator to section 4 of the transportation act, page 33, under which the commission at the present time in fixing a joint route and through rate can not fix it indiscriminately over all roads.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not.

Mr. KELLOGG. It can include all of the carrier's line, unless it is unreasonably long; but it can not to-day fix a joint rate over all lines.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question on a different branch of the subject and not relating to the legal question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield again to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has stated that he is in favor of mileage books. I notice that this bill provides for the issuance of 5,000-mile books. The Senator will recall that the railroads, under the system prevailing before the World War, provided for 1,000-mile books. I think they may have issued books covering a greater mileage, but the one commonly in use was the 1,000-mile ticket. Does not the Senator think, if we establish any system of mileage books, that we ought to provide that a 1,000-mile book shall be issued instead of a 5,000-mile book?

Mr. CUMMINS. My answer to that question is found in the amendment which I have offered, which authorizes the commission to require the carriers to issue this form of transportation for distances not greater than 5,000 miles and not less than 1,000 miles.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thought the Senator might agree to that proposition. I think it is very much better to provide for 1,000-mile books than for 5,000-mile books.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, having stated my general attitude toward this matter, I intend now to state why I am opposed to the bill at present under consideration. I am opposed to it in its present form for the following reasons:

First, it is plainly, obviously unconstitutional; second, if it were constitutional——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before he proceeds to his second objection?

Mr. CUMMINS. I intend to argue that presently; I am simply now stating my reasons for opposing the bill in its present form. However, I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I want to ask the Senator whether or not he refers to that particular portion of the bill having reference to intrastate rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not entirely. I will come to that later.

Second, if it were constitutional, it is manifestly unwise for Congress to attempt to fix either freight rates or passenger rates.

Third, because just at this time we ought not to put any obstacle in the way of the efforts of the commission or the carriers to reduce freight rates. The passage of this bill, as it is now before the Senate, will just as surely arrest the progress of that movement as that time is to go on.

Fourth, the difference of practically 1 cent per mile would be the grossest sort of discrimination in favor of corporations and individuals who can afford to buy $125 worth of transportation at one time.

Fifth, because it takes direct possession of the authority which, in my judgment, is vested in the several States and attemps to fix passenger rates within the States and for journeys wholly within the borders of a single State. As earnestly as some advocates of universal and national control have contended for the proposition, Congress never yet has attempted to assert the power of fixing, primarily and directly, the rates either for the transportation of freight or the transportation of passengers wholly within a State.

I shall address myself to these objections in the order that I have named them, first asking that the amendment which I have offered shall be printed not only, as it would naturally be, in the RECORD but that it shall be printed so that if this bill is not disposed of to-night it can be laid upon the desks of the several Members of the Senate to-morrow morning.

It must be observed from what I have stated that I do not approach the discussion of this question in a hostile spirit. I mean, I recognize the demand which the commercial travelers of the United States have made for this form of transportation, and I am not prepared to say that they should not have the privilege of buying transportation at wholesale at lower rates than the person who buys a specific ticket for a particular journey. In so far as the selling of transportation in this way and in so far as all the operations which are connected with that transportation are concerned which tend to reduce the cost of the service, the Interstate Commerce Commission may very well, in my judgment, establish a lower rate per mile than the ordinary rate which is now in force or which may be in force at any given time.

I want your attention for a moment to the question of constitutionality.

It would be rather impertinent on my part to enter upon an extensive argument upon the proposition I have just made, inasmuch as I have before me a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which, in my judgment, is exactly and precisely applicable to the present bill. I beg to say that we have given to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to establish maximum rates—latterly minimum rates also, in some cases—but the general authority is to establish maximum reasonable rates for the carriage of passengers and the transportation of freight. I mention that in order to show that the authority we have given the Interstate Commerce Commission, so far as interstate commerce is concerned, is exactly the authority which the Legislature of Michigan attempted to exercise over the State rates in the case I have before me.

The case to which I refer is that of Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. against Smith. It is reported in One hundred and seventy-third United States, beginning at page 684.

The statute of the State of Michigan, which came finally under review in the Supreme Court, was as follows—I am reading only that part which relates to this subject:

Provided further, That 1,000-mile tickets shall be kept for sale at the principal ticket offices of all railroad companies in this State or carrying on business partly within and partly without the limits of the State at a price not exceeding $20 in the lower peninsula and $25 in the upper peninsula. Such 1,000-mile tickets may be made nontransferable, but, whenever required by the purchaser, they shall be issued in the names of the purchaser, his wife, and children, designating the name of each on such ticket, and in case such ticket is presented by any other than the person or persons named thereon the conductor may take it up and collect fare, and thereupon such 1,000-mile ticket shall be forfeited to the railroad company. Each 1,000-mile ticket shall be valid for two years only after date of purchase, and in case it is not wholly used within the time the company issuing the same shall redeem the unused portion thereof, if presented by the purchaser for redemption within 30 days after the expiration . . such time, and shall on such redemption be entitled to charge 3 cents per mile for the portion thereof used.

It will be observed that this legislation adopted by the State of Michigan is, so far as this question is concerned—that is, the constitutionality of the legislation—exactly like the bill proposed by the Senator from Indana [Mr. WATSON] and now under consideration by the Senate. I do not mean that the rate per mile is the same; I do not mean that all the conditions under which the tickets were to be used is the same; but in every respect, so far as the power of Congress to pass such a statute is concerned, the cases are parallel.

The validity of that law came before the Supreme Court in the case to which I have referred. There is first presented in the opinion the question of the power of the State to adopt regulatory legislation in view of an alleged contract between the State and the railroad; but that is easily disposed of, and I need not read any part of the opinion which refers to that question. I read now from page 690:

The question is presented in this case whether the legislature of a State, having power to fix maximum rates and charges for the transportation of persons and property by railroad companies, with the limitations above stated, and having power to alter, amend, or repeal their charters, within certain limitations, has also the right, after having fixed a maximum rate for the transportation of passengers, to still further regulate their affairs and to discriminate and make an exception in favor of certain persons, and give to them a right of transportation for a less sum than the general rate provided by law.

We have undoubtedly the power to fix passenger rates for all interstate carriers. We have delegated that power to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed and has promulgated a schedule or tariff for passenger rates everywhere throughout the United States, and this is what the court says about the Michigan legislation:

It is said that the power to create this exception is included in the greater power to fix rates generally; that having the right to establish maximum rates, it therefore has power to lower those rates in certain cases and in favor of certain individuals, while maintaining them or permitting them to be maintained at a higher rate in all other cases. It is asserted also that this is only a proper and reasonable regulation.

It does not seem to us that this claim is well founded. We can not regard this exceptional legislation as the exercise of a lesser right which is included in the greater one to fix by statute maximum rates for railroad companies. The latter is a power to make a general rule applicable in all cases and without discrimination in favor of or against any individual. It is the power to declare a general law upon the subject of rates beyond which the company can not go, but within which it is at liberty to conduct its work in such a manner as may seem to it best suited for its prosperity and success. This is a very different power from that exercised in the passage of this statute. The act is not a general law upon the subject of rates, establishing maximum rates which the company can in no case violate. The legislature having established such maximum as a general law, now assumes to interfere with the management of the company while conducting its affairs pursuant to and obeying the statute regulating rates and charges, and notwithstanding such rates it assumes to provide for a discrimination, an exception in favor of those who may desire and are able to purchase tickets at what might be called wholesale rates—a discrimination which operates in favor of the wholesale buyer, leaving the others subject to the general rule. And it assumes to regulate the time in which the tickets purchased shall be valid and to lengthen it to double the period the railroad company has ever before provided. It thus invades the general right of a company to conduct and manage its own affairs, and compels it to give the use of its property for less than the general rate to those who come within the provisions of the statute, and to that extent it would seem that the statute takes the property of the company without due process of law. We speak of the general right of the company to conduct and manage its own affairs; but at the same time it is to be understood that the company is subject to the unquestioned jurisdiction of the legislature in the exercise of its power to provide for the safety, the health, and the convenience of the public, and to prevent improper exactions or extortionate charges from being made by the company.

It is stated upon the part of the defendant in error that the act is a mere regulation of the public business, which the legislature has a right to regulate, and its apparent object is to promote the convenience of persons having occasion to travel on railroads and to reduce for them the cost of transportation; that its benefit to the public who are compelled to patronize railroads is unquestioned; that it brings the reduction of rates of 2 cents per mile within the reach of all persons who may have occasion to make only infrequent trips; and that there is no reason why the legislature may not fix the period of time within which the holder of the ticket shall be compelled to use it. The reduction of rates in favor of those purchasing this kind of ticket is thus justified by the reasons stated.

The right to claim from the company transportation at reduced rates by purchasing a certain amount of tickets is classed as a convenience. As so defined, it would be more convenient if the right could be claimed without any compensation whatever. But such a right is not a convenience at all within the meaning of the term as used in relation to the subject of furnishing conveniences to the public. And also the convenience which the legislature is to protect is not the convenience of a small portion only of the persons who may travel on the road, while refusing such alleged convenience to all others, nor is the right to obtain tickets for less than the general and otherwise lawful rate to be properly described as a convenience. If that were true, the granting of the right to some portion of the public to ride free on all trains and at all times might be so described.

I will not read more of the opinion. It argues at considerable length the claim that is here made, and decides against it.

Mr. President, I believe that the Interstate Commerce Commission, in accordance with the principle of this opinion, after it makes the proper investigation, and after it determines that the cost of the service, if it so finds, is less in the case of mileage tickets than in the case of specific tickets, can make a reasonable, fair reduction in passenger fares in behalf of those who use mileage tickets; but it must not be an arbitrary reduction. It must be based upon sound, economic reasons. It must be based upon precisely the same reasons, in principle, which obtain in the case referred to by the Senator from Arkansas in freight rates. The rate per hundred pounds is less in the movement of freight in carload lots than when it is moved in less than carload lots, and for very plain, manifest reasons, because the railroad company can move a given number of pounds in carload lots at a lower cost than it can move the same number of pounds in less than carload lots, and it would be unfair to establish a tariff that would require the payment of the same rate per pound or per hundred pounds or per ton of freight in carload lots and in less than carload lots.

I want the Senate to remember that the man who has one carload to move moves it at the same rate given to the man who has a hundred carloads of that commodity to move. There is no reduction in the carload rate an account of the number of carloads that any particular shipper may desire to ship. That question has been argued at very great length. It has been urged upon the Interstate Commerce Commission, almost from the time the commission was organized, that a great shipper, like the United States Steel Co., or the Standard Oil Co., or any other great factory which furnishes hundreds and thousands of carloads every month or every year, is entitled to a lower rate per carload than the shipper who ships but one carload per year of that commodity; but the commission has stood steadfastly and firmly against the effort to reduce the carload rates because of the extent of the business of the shipper, and I think very wisely.

In this case if the commission, after its investigation, finds that the railroads can afford, by reason of lessened cost, to sell 5,000-mile tickets or 2,000-mile tickets, I believe it has, or would have if my amendment were passed, the authority to require the railroads to issue those tickets; but an act simply declaring that every railroad in the United States shall issue 5,000-mile tickets, usable and good upon every other railroad in the United States, when the rate established by the commission as a fair and reasonable rate for travel is substantially 1 cent per mile higher than that mentioned in the bill before us, is beyond our power. It is not only unfair and unjust, but it is not within our constitutional authority to enact.

Every man who knows anything about the subject knows that there is not the difference of 1 cent or 1⅛ cents per mile in the cost of the service, comparing mileage tickets and specific tickets. There may be some difference; I am not prepared to say what it is. I am not well enough informed to say what it is, any more than I am well enough informed to say what should be the rate upon a carload of apples from Arkansas to Chicago or New York. Whenever the Congress of the United States enters upon the field of determining at what rate either commodities or persons shall be carried throughout the United States, it will not only enter a field of chaos and confusion but it will inflict infinite injury not on the railroads alone but upon the commerce of the country as well.

We have organized a commission which has now been functioning for about 26 years, and its members are constantly investigating these subjects, and they are as familiar with them as their mentality will permit them to be. That commission is the proper authority to declare what the rate upon a mileage ticket shall be.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURSUM in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. The position of the Senator as the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate gives to his judgment unusual force, and therefore I should be very glad to get his judgment upon this proposition: If I understood him rightly, the Senator from Iowa said that in proportion as the return to the railroads from interchangeable mileage tickets was greater than from ordinary individual tickets, in that proportion there was a justification for a reduction of rate on interchangeable mileage tickets.

Mr. CUMMINS. My statement was a little broader than that.

Mr. SPENCER. Did the Senator from Iowa go that far?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will repeat what I said.

Mr. SPENCER. I should be indebted if the Senator would.

Mr. CUMMINS. A railroad company in issuing mileage tickets reduces its expenses somewhat, because it sells 5,000 miles at a single time and by a single act.

Mr. SPENCER. It sells at wholesale.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not require so many agents to sell these tickets as would be required if the tickets were sold for each 10 miles or each 100 miles. That is simply an illustration. In so far as the use of transportation in that form reduces the cost of the service, I believe that it is constitutional and would be within the authority of the commission, if we adopt the amendment I have offered, to reduce the mileage rate of these mileage tickets or books to that extent; but when it comes to the further question of allowing a commercial traveler, simply because he is a commercial traveler, to travel at less than I have to pay when I travel, I rebel.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, the Senator understands that this does not apply only to commercial travelers?

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that, and I want to do everything in my power for the commercial travelers. They are the best fellows in the world, and while this particular movement is rather a movement on the part of the wholesale houses than of the commercial travelers themselves, I recognize that they are relying upon an old custom of years ago, and I am in sympathy with them to that extent, but not further. I do not know of any reason why a man in my State who must sell his corn at 30 cents a bushel and practically makes nothing out of it after he pays for its production and its transportation, and who can not and never would buy a mileage ticket, should not have the same privileges of transportation, or approximately the same, as the man who is able to buy and use a very large amount of transportation.

Mr. SPENCER. I think the Senator from Iowa is mistaken about the lack of interest of the commercial travelers, for a very obvious reason. It might be said that any reduction in the rate arising out of the sale of interchangeable mileage books would be paid by the employer and not by the commercial traveler; but just in proportion as the cost of operating commercial travelers upon the road decreases, just in that proportion their number increases and their routes increase, and therefore the commercial traveler is naturally very much interested.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no doubt that the commercial traveler is financially interested in a bill of this sort, and he has a right to just such a reduction as I have indicated. He has no right to a reduction of passenger rates simply to stimulate the business of the country any more than the farmer has a right to a reduction in his rate to permit him to reach the market and sell at a fair profit.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator has reached the second question I was going to ask him; he has answered the first. What does the Senator from Iowa think about the point that is made, that commercial travelers using the railroads for the business of selling, at different points, articles which in turn require transportation themselves are the source from which an exceedingly large additional amount of freight and expressage arises—of course to the benefit of the railroads—and that because of that fact, from the railroad's standpoint, they are entitled to certain consideration in regard to the cost of their transportation?

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not recognize that title to a lower rate of freight. That, of course, was the very principle upon which passes were based, that a man who had a large amount of freight to send to market was entitled to free transportation, and for years and years he was given free transportation; but we abolished that custom and that principle long ago, and I hope will never return to it. I do not believe that it is either practicable or just to issue transportation to a manufacturer or mercantile house at a lower rate than others enjoy because that manufacturer or that establishment may furnish more freight to the railroad company.

Mr. NORRIS. Was it not true that it was not always the man who had property to ship to whom the pass was given, but they were even given to the fellow who had votes that he could control?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oftentimes, I think so; and not only were the passes given to the actual producer but they were given to any person for whom the actual producer asked a pass. It became so universal in my State, at a time when the railway rate was 3 cents per mile by statute, that the actual amount received by the railroad companies for the carriage of passengers in that State was a little less than 2 cents per mile.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to ask the Senator another question. I have never heard the point discussed, and yet it seems to me to be a very important one and one that ought to be taken into consideration in the issuing of mileage books if they are issued at all.

A large proportion of the expense of operating the passenger department of the railroad is taken up by the handling of baggage. It is proposed to allow baggage privileges on these mileage books the same as on tickets. Why would it not be a practicable proposition to issue two kinds of mileage books, one with the baggage privilege, and one without the baggage privilege at a lower rate. It would be perfectly proper to require a railroad company to issue those that did not carry the baggage privilege at a less rate because they would have no expense of handling the baggage.

Mr. CUMMINS. I see very readily the force of the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska. If he will observe the amendment which I have offered to the bill by way of a substitute, he will find that I have directed the Interstate Commerce Commission to prescribe by regulation what baggage privileges shall be attached to a mileage book.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I did observe that as it was read. That is one reason why I have asked the question. I have thought about it a great many times. It seemed to me in common justice some regulation of that kind ought to be put into force, if not unjust to anybody, because assuming, which is a proper assumption, I think, that the railroad company gets a just return for whatever rate it charges for the ticket of transportation, mileage book, or whatever it may be, the people who travel without baggage and never use the baggage privilege are, as a matter of fact, paying just as much to the railroad company as the people who require the handling of baggage and get the benefit of it, which means in the aggregate many millions of dollars each year.

It is only a matter of common justice that the man, whether he is a commercial traveling man or an ordinary citizen, who is traveling and does not require the handling of any baggage on the part of the railroad company, ought to be carried for a less amount of money than the man who has 150 pounds of baggage that must be carried also.

Mr. CUMMINS. As a matter of fact, that is undoubtedly true.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, it would result that, as a very large percentage of commercial travelers have their sample trunks with them, the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska would mean an increase in their rate over the ordinary traveler rather than a decrease in their rate, because there is a large proportion of commercial travelers, the exact number I am unable to give, who travel, as the Senator knows, with their sample trunks, and one of the real sources of excess baggage is from the excess baggage of the commercial travelers. So that if those who have baggage were charged more than those who did not have baggage, the regulation would mean for commercial travelers an increase of rates and not a decrease.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. In making this suggestion, I am not thinking of the commercial travelers any more than I am of other individuals. I am thinking of the matter of common honesty and common fairness. If it costs the railroad company more to carry me with my baggage than they get for carrying me and my baggage, it is not right to compel the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who has no baggage, to pay enough to the railroad company for carrying him to make up what it loses on me.

Mr. CUMMINS. As a matter of literal adjustment there could be no doubt about the proposition of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator as a practical proposition if it would be a difficult thing for the Interstate Commerce Commission to ascertain and to fix a different rate? My proposal is not, as I understand it, impractical. It would not be difficult to put in operation, would it?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not impractical as I look at it at the moment. It would be difficult to ascertain with any certainty just how much less the rate should be upon a ticket unaccompanied by baggage privileges than the ticket accompanied by baggage privileges. Personally I have no idea how much less it should be. Nevertheless, it could be done within fair bounds. All these things are susceptible of ascertainment in the limits that enable people to act reasonably upon them.

Now, if I may recur to the point I am submitting. For those reasons I hope that Congress or the Senate will not now enter upon this new field of fixing a rate at which either a person or a commodity may be carried in any part of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator from Iowa was ill, as I recall, at the time of one of the meetings of the Interstate Commerce Committee at which the whole matter was discussed.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was absent from all the meetings at which the bill was considered in the committee.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It was not formally considered. It was brought up on two or three occasions. I think the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] was present. In those discussions it was regarded as essential that the language on page 2, line 2, as follows:

> Without regard to whether the points of origin and destination for any single journey are within the same State—should be stricken out. I think the Senator from Arkansas is in full accord with the proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. First, because they thought it was unconstitutional and, second, because the committee was not willing to go that far, the committee not believing that Congress should exercise the right, if, indeed, it had the power, which was gravely questioned, to compel railroads to issue rates for mileage books to be used wholly within a State; that is, to control State rates.

Mr. ROBINSON. With the permission of the Senator from Iowa I will say that I and other proponents of the bill will make no objection to the amendment which has been suggested by the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I would like to ask the Senator from Arkansas, if the Senator from Iowa will permit a further interruption——

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. How much, in the Senator's judgment, would that take from the decrease that would come from the establishment of this custom or practice?

Mr. ROBINSON. I have said that I did not believe any decrease in the revenues of the railroads as a whole would result from the adoption of this legislation, but I can not say what difference that would make. I have no information upon the subject.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is to say, taking the commercial travelers, for instance, what proportion of the total trips they make are wholly within a State and what proportion are interstate?

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not think anybody could answer that. I have no information on the subject.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. One of the commercial travelers was present on a day when we had a meeting of the Interstate Commerce Committee, at which this matter was discussed, and he called me outside. He was representing them here. He stated to me that in his judgment about 40 per cent of all the trips made were intrastate and 60 per cent interstate. Of course, I thought there was a much larger percentage intrastate and was surprised at the statement. But taking that into consideration it would make a difference in the question of revenue.

Mr. ROBINSON. The commercial travelers, or at least their representatives here, raised no objection, so far as I am informed, to the amendment which was suggested by the Senator from Indiana, which would eliminate one of the objections urged by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. That amendment, if offered and agreed to, would eliminate one, and the least important, of the objections which I make to the bill.

The third objection which I have to the passage of the measure at this time relates to a provision which I shall read again, because just at this time we ought not to put any obstacle in the way of the efforts of the commission or the carriers to reduce freight rates. The passage of the bill that is now before the Senate would just as surely arrest the progress of that movement as time is to go on. We all know that ever since the increase in rates, since the return of the properties to the owners, an increase that was ordered on the 26th of August, 1920, there has been a continuous and, as I thought, praiseworthy endeavor on the part of those who were interested in the commerce of the country to secure a reduction in the rates that were thus established in what is known or referred to by the Senator from Arkansas as Ex parte 74.

It was quite impossible, as everybody will see, for the commission having in charge the reestablishment of the credit of the railroad companies, among other things, and having in charge a commerce that is inestimable in magnitude, to issue any order that would be just in all its parts. The commission has been constantly reviewing that order. I suppose there have been 5,000 reductions in rates or readjustments in rates since August 26, 1920.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. The country is so tremendously large and its commerce is so infinitely complicated that no consideration of it at any given time can possibly create a rate fabric or structure that will be just and reasonable in all its parts.

I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. While it is true that there have been individual reductions from time to time, there have also been a great many increases.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I recall notably that there have been such increases on road materials and things of that kind.

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly so, but I venture to say that the increases in rates since that time have been absolutely negligible so far as revenue is concerned. It may be that there have been some readjustments as between State rates and interstate rates, in which there has been an increase of some particular rate in order to remove the discrimination which that rate created against some other locality or some other enterprise, but the tendency has been all the time and the struggle has been all the time to reduce these rates. That is natural, because the increase of such rates came just at a time when a great many industries of the land practically collapsed.

I hope that many Senators heard the analysis which was given on yesterday or the day before by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] with regard to the reasons for the partial cessation of business which occurred in the latter part of 1920 and during 1921. I have never heard any analysis of our situation or of the situation throughout the world so comprehensive and so accurate as the one which was submitted by the Senator from Virginia. I restate that it was inevitable that the people who were doing business at a loss, that the farmers who were unable to sell their products in the market at the cost of production, should appear before the Interstate Commerce Commission, not only one day but every day, hoping that there might be some reduction from what was the highest cost of transportation ever established in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Iowa state that there have been a great many reductions in freight rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. I state there have been more than 5,000 such readjustments, generally reductions.

Mr. NORRIS. Reductions made by the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. CUMMINS. Reductions approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission and many of them made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Those were not general reductions, however.

Mr. NORRIS. I remembr not long ago, probably a couple of weeks ago, I received a letter from one of the experts of the Nebraska State railroad commission, in which he said, in substance, that the State commission had been prohibited by an injunction of the United States court from decreasing intrastate rates, and the Interstate Commerce Commission had issued an order permitting them to increase intrastate rates. So, applying entirely to intrastate rates, they were met with an order of the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington permitting them to increase such rates, and by an injunction from the United States court restraining them from decreasing them. If there have been many instances of that kind—and the expert, as I remember, said there were other States which were in the same predicament—it would look to me as though it would be impossible to get a decrease, but a very easy thing to get an increase of a freight rate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CUMMINS. In just a moment. Permit me first to answer the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

I suppose our committee has accumulated 5,000 pages of testimony upon the point suggested by the Senator from Nebraska. That question, however, will arise upon a different bill, and I do not intend to try to enter upon the history of the relation between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the State railroad commissions at this time; but I can say that the Interstate Commerce Commission—not the State commissions, but the Interstate Commerce Commission—or the railroads have readjusted or reduced 5,000 individual freight rates. So I am informed; I have not attempted to reckon them; but that is my information from those who are familiar with the work of the commission.

There have been as well some general reductions, covering great commodities, over a large territory, and I am about to refer to two which have most recently occurred. Now I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In connection with the information sought by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I will say that not very long ago—I can not give the number of weeks exactly—I asked the Interstate Commerce Commission to make out for me a list of reductions which it had made in freight rates, specifying the instances, and so forth. They furnished that information to me. Afterwards there was a demand by a great many people for its publication, and Representative SANDERS of my State wanted to have it published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; but it was too voluminous for that, and so he secured the privilege in the House of having it printed as a public document. It was printed for circulation, and the Senator from Nebraska may obtain a copy of it and ascertain the rates themselves and the reductions which have been made on the initiative of the Interstate Commerce Commission itself, I think, running something over 5,000 in number.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no doubt about the fact. Furthermore, in recent months the Interstate Commerce Commission reduced the rates on hay and grain in various parts of the country from 16 to 20 per cent. Very shortly after that the railroad companies, of their own motion and under the approval, of course, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, reduced by 10 per cent the rates on all agricultural products everywhere, and upon many other commodities of a bulky and heavy nature. In addition to that, at this time the Interstate Commerce Commission is pursuing an investigation, which it entered into somewhere near the middle of December, for the purpose of ascertaining whether the freight rates and the passenger rates of the country could still be further reduced. The division which have that matter in charge have been devoting all of their time to that investigation, hoping, as we all hope, that they will be able still further to reduce the rates of transportation for both passengers and freight. It is the most important investigation—and it was begun entirely upon initiative of the commission itself—that has ever been carried on.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator does he not think that we would make more progress toward reducing rates if we would confer the authority now reposed in the Railway Wage Board on the Interstate Commerce Commission and let them get at the matter in a business way?

Mr. CUMMINS. I hesitate, Mr. President, to take up that question. There is a very strong movement in favor of doing that thing, and the principal movement in that direction, as I understand, is by the railroads. They want a union of those two functions of Government, and we will presently have to decide whether there ought to be a union of those two great powers; that is, the power to fix rates of transportation and the power to decide the disputes which arise between railroad companies and their employees. However, I would rather not enter upon an argument of that proposition at this time.

Mr. DIAL. I will not insist on an answer, but, so far as I am concerned, I should like to repeal all these laws and let the railroads go along like other institutions and run their roads on a common-sense basis.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is a view which is held by a great many people and by the roads especially.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I want to say that I share the opinion of the Senator from South Carolina so far as the Railway Wage Board is concerned. If I had my way about it, I would abolish the Railway Wage Board outright and not transfer its functions to any other body.

Mr. DIAL. I quite agree with that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And abolish the Interstate Commission, too?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I should not agree to that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am just as anxious that the workingmen shall be protected in fair wages as I am that shippers shall be protected in fair rates; I think that one is just as necessary for the prosperity of the country as is the other.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. There is no question about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I want it distinctly understood that, whoever may exercse the power, whether the Interstate Commerce Commission or the Railway Wage Board, I am not in favor of abolishing a tribunal to adjudicate disputes between the railroad companies and their employees. If the railroad companies had free rein at this time, and could cut the wages of their employees in two, as some people think they should do, I know that freght rates could be reduced very greatly; but I do not believe that the employees of the railroad companies, in view of the present situation, should be at the mercy of their employers so far as a reduction in wages is concerned.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not concur in the opinion which has been expressed by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that at this stage in our history we should repeal all legislation establishing regulatory authority and leave the railroads to run their business without any regulation whatsoever. I concur in what I understand to be the statement of the Senator from Iowa in this particular, that the best interests of this country require the preservation of the power and its exercise by tribunals to adjust controversies relating to rates and to fix rates and also to adjust controversies arising out of labor disputes; and I think no more retrogressive action could be taken or proposed than that suggested by the Senator from South Carolina and approved by the Senator from Indiana. I make this statement not because I regard it as pertinent to the subject under discussion but for fear that my failure to say anything about it might be construed into acquiescence.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. DIAL. I do not desire to enter into the discussion at this time. I merely want to remark that to have the rules governing the railroads in my section of the State, where we run one or two trains a day, the same as in other sections of the State, where they run hundreds of trains a day, is inconsistent with common sense and business, and some remedy should be provided.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, in all deference to the Senator from South Carolina, he may remember that that is a condition which was brought about during Federal control, and by the order of the directer general. The United States Labor Board is readjusting that situation just as rapidly as it can be done with fairness and justice to both railroads and employees.

[At this point Mr. CUMMINS yielded the floor for the day.]

Thursday, January 19, 1922.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I regret very much that most of the Senators who are or ought to be very deeply interested in the subject we are discussing are finding it inconvenient to be present. This regret is not personal, because it makes no difference to me whether they are here or elsewhere. I am performing what I regard as a duty, and I must perform it under the existing circumstances and not under the conditions which I wish might prevail.

When we suspended the consideration of the bill yesterday I was presenting a phase of the subject which I think ought to be extremely interesting to those who are concerned in the movement now in progress throughout the United States having for its object the reduction of freight rates, and especially those who are concerned in the reduction of rates upon agricultural products, for presently they will be compelled, from my viewpoint, to vote upon the question whether they would rather reduce passenger rates 25 per cent to a limited class of people or whether they would prefer to give the Interstate Commerce Commission a fair opportunity to reduce freight rates.

I repeat the proposition stated yesterday. It is unwise to pass the bill now pending, because just at this time we ought not to put any obstacle in the way of the efforts of the Interstate Commerce Commission or the carriers to reduce freight rates. The passage of the pending measure as it is now before the Senate would just as surely arrest the progress of that movement as time is to go on.

I will state the proposition in a different way.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an interruption?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not know that I understood the Senator correctly, but I understood him to state that Congress would be called upon to vote upon some measure looking to a reduction of the present exorbitant rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. Not at all. I said if the pending bill were passed reducing by 25 per cent the rate for passenger travel that the result would necessarily be considered by the Interstate Commerce Commission in passing upon the demand for a reduction in freight rates. I am about to establish that; I think I can establish it to the satisfaction of every Senator who hears me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, it is perfectly obvious that if the passenger rates are reduced as proposed, whatever reduction in revenues ensues from that source must be made up by the maintenance of high rates somewhere else or an increase of rates. There is no question about that. However, I understood the Senator to say that action was expected of Congress touching the matter of the existing exorbitant freight rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator misunderstood me. At least I did not mean to suggest anything of that kind.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator whether it is proposed to submit to the Congress any legislation looking to a correction of that troublesome situation?

Mr. CUMMINS. It has been the policy of the United States for years to submit to an impartial, semijudicial body the question of the just and reasonable rates that ought to prevail throughout the United States, both for the carriage of passengers and the transportation of freight. The Interstate Commerce Commission is now and has been for a long time, for a year past and more, engaged in an investigation looking to a reduction of all rates, if it be possible to reduce them in view of conditions which now prevail.

I have not even imagined the possibility that Congress at this time or at any time would withdraw from the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission the duty of fixing freight rates. For Congress to enter upon the task of adjusting the freight rates of the United States would be simply to publish its incapacity to deal with the subject.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I can not think that anybody could doubt the accuracy of that proposition, but of course the Interstate Commerce Commission acts by virtue of the power delegated to it by Congress. It, of course, is always engaged in the duty of ascertaining whether rates may in justice be reduced; that is what it is there for and it is engaged in that duty; but rates have not been reduced in any substantial way. No one better than the Senator from Iowa knows of the onerous burden that industry suffers by reason of the existing rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not agree with the Senator's last statement. On the contrary, freight rates in the last year have been reduced in a very substantial way, and they are being reduced from time to time. Just recently the commission has entered upon a further investigation to ascertain whether, in view of the revenues which the railroad companies have been receiving under existing rates, such rates may be still further reduced and yet preserve our transportation system.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Just one other question. I understand the Committee on Interstate Commerce has likewise been considering this subject and has been conducting extensive investigations in reference to the matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. We have been engaged almost constantly since last May in taking testimony upon that question.

Mr. KELLOGG. That investigation, however, bears more particularly on the question as to whether or not further legislation is necessary, and not on the question as to whether we should reduce or fix any rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. So, the Senator would say that under existing law the industries of the country have got to depend upon the Interstate Commerce Commission for whatever relief they may obtain.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has stated the situation correctly. The scope of our investigation has been twofold, in a sense; we are acting under a general resolution that commands us to ascertain whether the extraordinary expenses which the railroad companies report are just and fair, and whether there is any way in which we can legislate to reduce the expenses or costs of transportation. We are also, and we have been three months now, taking testimony upon bills which have been introduced by various Senators to amend the transportation act of 1920.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me ask, then, if the committee will be able to report whether the very large expenditures which are now being incurred and which reduce the gross revenues of the railroads may be reduced?

Mr. CUMMINS. We shall be ready to report just as soon as we can finish taking the testimony upon the first resolution. We have closed the testimony upon the bills which have been introduced to amend the transportation act, and we are proceeding just as rapidly as possible to report upon those bills.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, the Senator from Iowa will understand that I address these inquiries to him because of the multitude of letters that come to Senators, including myself, inquiring when some kind of relief may be expected from the present deplorable condition.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no doubt of the imperative demand—"imperative" in the sense of being emphatic—for the reduction of rates; but there is just as imperative a demand for the continuance of our transportation system; and I assume that neither Congress nor any other power will attempt to destroy our transportation system. In order that it be maintained it is necessary that its revenue as a whole shall be adequate. That is the question that we are considering in the committee.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. DIAL. I am deeply interested in the subject, and the question which I desire to ask the Senator from Iowa is merely for information. Am I correct in my recollection that Congress has never heretofore passed a law proposing to fix a passenger rate?

Mr. CUMMINS. That is my recollection. I do not know of any law which Congress has ever passed fixing either freight or passenger rates.

Mr. DIAL. Then, if we should pass this bill fixing such rates, we should be liable to be called upon to fix rates on all commodities?

Mr. CUMMINS. I think that would be a very natural consequence of the adoption of such policy upon the part of Congress.

Mr. DIAL. I myself had no recollection of Congress ever having gone that far.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think the Senator from South Carolina may assume that Congress has never undertaken to do that thing.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, it is a fact, though, is it not, that the States, within their jurisdiction, have frequently passed legislation fixing both passenger and freight rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. As my recollection goes, I think, beginning with 1872 or 1873, some of the States of the Union passed maximum tariff laws covering both freight and passenger service.

Mr. SHIELDS. And in the subsequent litigation in the several States it was held by the Federal courts that the fixing of railroad rates and charges was a legislative question, and the determination whether or not such rates and charges were confiscatory was a judicial question.

Mr. CUMMINS. That original attempt gave rise to so much litigation and so much dissatisfaction that very soon nearly all of the States abandoned the effort to fix freight rates by legislation or by statute, and created commissions. I think there are commissions now in every State in the Union, save possibly two, having authority to control and regulate and publish schedules relating to freight rates. Most of the commissions have no authority over passenger rates, although some of them have; but it is not necessary for me now, I think, to specify those States which have commissions with such authority and those which have not, for that is not material to this inquiry.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think the Senator will find that in a great majority of the States the power over both freight and passenger rates is given by the legislature to the State commission.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not so recollect, but the Senator from Minnesota may be correct about that.

Mr. SHIELDS. I thought the Senator was making the point that the legislatures did not exercise the power themselves, but vested it in commissions. Of course, that could not be urged as due to a want of power in the legislative body, for whatever power they can delegate they can exercise themselves.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am not insisting that Congress has no power to establish freight rates or passenger rates. I agree that Congress, if it desired to do so and had sufficient information to do so, could fix every one of the millions of rates upon which transportation is now carried on. I am only saying that if it attempted to exercise that power the transportation of the United States would quickly fall into such confusion that the condition would be intolerable, and I think that the practice would not be persisted in very long. But I am only saying at the present time that if the Congress of the United States now determines that a certain class of its people shall be carried at 2½ cents a mile, the Interstate Commerce Commission, in considering what revenue the railroads ought to receive, must take into account the reduced revenues, if they shall be reduced by the fixing of the passenger rate at 2½ cents a mile, and adjust the freight rates accordingly, for it is fundamental that the railroad companies, if they are to be maintained, must have a revenue derived from the operation of their properties that will be sufficient to maintain them. I repeat, therefore, that if by enacting this bill we take $5,000,000 or $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 from the revenues of the railroad companies, taken as a whole, then, if the existing revenues of the railroad companies are not more than sufficient to maintain them, it will be the absolute duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to increase freight rates in order to meet the deficit so created. That must be obvious to the most casual examiner of this subject.

It becomes, therefore, I think, my logical duty to inquire what the effect of establishing a passenger rate of 2½ cents a mile for those who are able to buy the mileage books provided for in this bill will have upon the revenues of the railroad companies. The Senator from Arkansas has submitted the case very fairly. He has an opinion with respect to the effect of reducing passenger rates in which I may or may not concur, but all that I say with regard to that is that it should be a subject upon which the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission should be taken.

I am not going to assert what the outcome might be so far as increased travel is concerned. That is the very thing that the Interstate Commerce Commission has been considering for more than a year, and it has considered it in the most deliberate way, after the most extensive and exhaustive hearings, and it has fixed the rates accordingly. If it believes that the passenger rates can be reduced so as to increase the net income of the railroad companies, well and good; but I would rather—and I think Congress would rather—accept the enlightened and informed judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon that question than the uninformed judgment of any Senator, however earnest and however studious he may be.

In order to ascertain as well as I could what would be the probable effect of the passage of this bill upon the revenues of the railroad companies, I submitted to the Interstate Commerce Commission an inquiry, and I have the answer of the commission before me. I do not intend to read all of it, because all of it is not material to the point I am now discussing; but part of it is very material. It is dated January 11, 1922, and this is what the commission says with regard to the point I am now making:

The commission has considered Senate bill No. 848—

That is the bill now before the Senate—sent to Chairman McChord with your letter of January 3, and referred the matter to its legislative committee for reply. In response to your request this committee submits the following information:

The first question I asked was this:

First, an estimate of the effect upon the revenues of the carriers for the year 1922, based upon the experience of 1920 and 1921.

I continue to read:

The passenger revenue of steam roads included in the regular monthly reports amounted to $1,288,808,159 for the calendar year 1920. For 1921 the corresponding figure is estimated at $1,178,900,000 (estimated by increasing the actual figure for 10 months by 20 per cent). The average of the two years is $1,233,854,080. Of this $32,828,000 may be taken as the Pullman surcharge—

I pause to remark upon that statement that the bill now before us abolishes the Pullman surcharge in so far as transportation is sought upon the mileage books required by the bill. It will be important to remember that when I come to estimate the loss of revenue that would be brought about by the bill.

Continuing:

And $56,750,000 is estimated as commutation revenue, leaving $1,144,275,480 as passenger revenue derived from fares other than commutation and surcharge. It is, of course, impossible to say what part of the traveling public would avail themselves of the proposed mileage books.

And it is obvious that it is impossible to predict with certainty what part of the public would avail themselves of the privileges accorded by this bill. There are parts of the country, under the old system of issuing mileage books prevailing before the war or before Federal control, in which not more than 5 or 10 per cent of the travel was upon mileage books. There are other parts of the country where before the war 75 or 80 per cent of the travel was upon mileage books. In New England, for instance, which is at the present time in a more unfortunate condition from a revenue standpoint than any other part of the country—that is to say, her railroads are more nearly insolvent and unable to carry on their functions as they ought to be carried on than those of any other part of the country—I have been informed, and that information comes from a report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that from 75 to 80 per cent of the travel was formerly upon mileage books; so that we can only estimate as best we can the proportion of the travel for which mileage books would be used.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. As I remember, the rate for mileage books before the war was the same as the rate for a ticket.

Mr. CUMMINS. Practically so. There was no substantial difference under the old practice between the rate for mileage books and the ordinary rate. We got to the point before the war where a 2-cent rate was common, save in some of the Western States, and the mileage books in the main were issued at 2 cents. There was no real discrimination between the passenger who used a mileage book and the passenger who used a specific ticket between specific points, but there was convenience on the part of the user of the mileage book, because he was not compelled at every point and everywhere to buy his ticket. We now propose in this bill to make a difference of practically 1 cent per mile—a difference that never would be sustained in any court of the land, and, I frankly say, a difference that the Interstate Commerce Commission, if it exercised common and ordinary sense, never would allow, and a difference that we never have dreamed of in former times.

I proceed:

The average revenue per passenger-mile, after excluding commutation and surcharge revenue, is about 3.3 cents.

That is the point to which I called the attention of the Senator from Arkansas yesterday. While 3.6 cents is the established rate, the railroads actually receive, aside from commutation and surcharge revenue, 3.3 cents per mile.

A reduction to 2.5 cents is a reduction of 8 mills, or 24.2 per cent.

It is a reduction of more than that when you consider that the surcharge upon Pullman traffic is also abolished by this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, does the Senator include in the 3.6 cents, which is said to be the average cost per mile for passenger travel, the items he has just mentioned? I asked Mr. Thom and the other witnesses in the hearing before the Interstate Commerce Committee what was the average first-class mileage rate, including the whole territory, and their reply, as I think will appear in the hearings, was 3.6 cents per mile.

Mr. CUMMINS. So it is; but the railroad companies do not get quite 3.6 cents per mile.

Mr. SMITH. The public pays 3.6 cents. I do not know who gets it, and I am not concerned about that just now; but what I want to get at is this: Did the Senator mean to say, in the statement he made a moment ago, that the surcharges on the Pullman traffic and the commutation rate do not go in to make up the amount earned by the railroads on their passenger fares?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have already read that part. They do go into the revenue, of course; but this table, for the purpose of ascertaining the ordinary charge per mile, deducts the $32,828,000 which is estimated as the Pullman surcharge.

Mr. SMITH. My impression is—I should have to look in the hearings to refresh my mind—that the 3.6 cents per mile did not take into consideration the surcharge on the Pullman traffic.

Mr. CUMMINS. It does not; but I am reducing here the amount of revenue received by the railroad companies from passenger traffic, and that, of course, includes the surcharge.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes; I did not understand it.

Mr. CUMMINS. (Reading:)

A reduction to 2.5 cents is a reduction of 8 mills, or 24.2 per cent. What this percentage of reduction would amount to if applied to various assumed proportions of the total travel affected by the mileage books is shown below.

Here is a table running all the way from 5 per cent to 25 per cent. I shall not read all of that table, for it is not necessary, although I shall ask leave to print it.

If we assume, taking the country over, that 25 per cent of the travel would be carried upon mileage books, then upon the average passenger traffic of the last two years the result would be a diminution in revenue of $69,200,000. If we add to the $69,200,000 a fair proportion of the Pullman surcharge, which would also be abolished by this bill, the fair result is that the revenue of the railroad companies would be reduced eighty or eighty-five million dollars a year through the application of the provisions of this bill.

I am not considering whether this reduction would result in such an increase in travel that the net income might be greater than heretofore simply for the reason that that is a question which has been before the Interstate Commerce Commission continuously since the passage of the transportation act—a question upon which that tribunal is infinitely better able to express an opinion than I am or than any other man, in my judgment, who may have occasion to study it casually. It looks at that question from every angle, from every standpoint, and fixes rates accordingly. It is one of the things which, according to the letter of the opinions rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission, it has taken and must take into consideration.

Mr. President, if we are to accept the judgment of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon questions of that kind, are we prepared to reduce by legislation the passenger revenues of the railroad companies of the country to the extent of eighty or eighty-five million dollars annually?

That is the question we must finally decide by the votes we cast upon this bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. KING. Perhaps the suggestion I am about to make would with greater propriety have been submitted when the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] was speaking. I confess I am very much disturbed over this proposed legislation and the results of it, and the precedent which it might constitute. As I understand, we have established the Interstate Commerce Commission and charged it with certain responsibilities. It has the right to initiate rates, and either to reduce or to increase rates; and it has the right, upon complaint being made, to investigate and to make findings and to carry those findings into effect.

If by legislation we say that they shall establish a rate which, as the Senator from Iowa states, will reduce the earnings approximately eighty or eighty-five million dollars, may we not by legislation make further declarations which would affect the earnings and consequently the value of the property, variously estimated at from twelve to twenty billion dollars? In other words, if we pass this act—and I have been very much in sympathy with it, and would like to support this measure if I could—is it not equivalent to saying that we have no confidence in the Interstate Commerce Commission and in its capacity to establish rates, to weigh the evidence pro and con, and to pronounce judgment? Are we not saying that we have not confidence in the Interstate Commerce Commission to pass upon this question? And if we say that, may we not be compelled by petitions from outside and from demands which may be made to pass other legislation saying that the freight rates shall be so and so, and so little by little whittle away the power of the Interstate Commerce Commission and reduce it to a mere executive body to put into operation through the railroads the mandates of Congress? Where will the end be? I would like to have the views of the Senator on that proposition.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Iowa will permit me, the Interstate Commerce Commission has no power and can have no power which the Congress does not give it. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator from Iowa to again express my view respecting the subject, but I think if Congress has sufficient intelligence and information upon which to determine this question it can be no reflection on the Interstate Commerce Commission if Congress determines the matter directly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know whether it would be construed as a reflection upon the individual members of the Interstate Commerce Commission or not, but it means that we ought to abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission. If Congress is to undertake to fix rates, there is no necessity for the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Suppose the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] were himself convinced that the rate on wool from Salt Lake to Boston was too high, and he were to introduce a bill providing that the rate on wool from Salt Lake to Boston should hereafter be so many cents a pound or so many dollars per hundredweight. That is the exact parallel of this bill, especially if he were to enlarge it so as to take in all wool from the western country. The same thing is true of grain from Iowa, corn and wheat; the same thing is true of hogs and cattle; and if we are not to pursue the policy of continuing in the Interstate Commerce Commission the power to say what constitutes fair and reasonable rates, both passenger and freight, then there is no longer occasion for maintaining that tribunal. That is what I have been persistently insisting upon ever since this bill was laid before the Senate.

I return now to the proposition that if we reduce the revenues of the railroad companies by seventy, eighty, ninety, or a hundred million dollars, the amount depending upon uncertain quantities which we can not accurately estimate, the Interstate Commerce Commission will feel itself compelled to raise that revenue through increased rates on the commodities which are transported by these railroad companies, and concerning which its jurisdiction is undoubted.

I am not presenting this matter from the standpoint of the railroads. I do not know whether they are for or against this measure. I can conceive of a good many reasons why they should be for it; but I have never undertaken to ascertain the views of the railway officials with regard to it. They are not primarily interested in it. They are entitled to a certain revenue. No matter whether we say that they are entitled to a certain revenue or not, the Constitution protects them in the return of a certain revenue, and it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the present law and under any law which we have ever had upon the subject, to see that the rates are so adjusted that the roads receive a sufficient revenue to answer the demands of the Constitution, as well as to preserve our transportation system.

Now I beg the attention of the Senate to a showing of the operation of the railroad companies during the year 1921. Estimating the net operating income of the railroad companies for the month of December of last year, inasmuch as we have no positive and accurate knowledge upon that subject from reports made by the railroad companies—and I think the estimate I make is a liberal one—at $50,000,000, the net operating income of all the class I railroads, comprising about 235,000 miles, most of the other railroads having no net income at all, for the year 1921 was $612,853,560. If the railroads are of the fair value of $12,000,000,000, which is substantially the amount of the outstanding bonds of these railroads, the net income for the past year was 5 per cent upon that value. If the fair value of the railroads is $18,900,000,000, as estimated by the Interstate Commerce Commission for the purposes of applying the transportation act of 1920, then the net income for 1921 was a little more than 3 per cent. Mark you, when I speak of the net operatating income, I am speaking of the amount remaining with the railroad companies, taken as a whole, applicable to the payment of interest upon their obligations and dividends upon their stocks.

There is not a man in the world, I think, who has any knowledge of this subject, who would contend that 5 per cent upon a valuation of $12,000,000,000 was more than the railroad companies ought to be permitted to earn. Practically it enables the railroad companies, taken as a whole, to pay the interest upon their bonds, without any profit or reward to the stockholders of those corporations. It will be observed that I am treating the railroad companies as a whole.

Four-fifths of the railroad companies in the United States in number, not in mileage, have not during the last year earned the interest upon their bonded obligations, and I venture to say that nearly half of them have failed to earn their operating expenses. But there are some of the railroads more fortunately situated, both geographically and as to industrial conditions, which have been able to earn more than the average which I have stated.

But this is not the whole story. During the last year the railroad companies have failed to expend for the maintenance of their properties $200,000,000, which they should have expended. Our railroads at this moment are not up to standard, even the standard of prewar times, in a degree measured by the expenditure of $200,000,000, and some time, and that before very long, the railroad companies will be compelled to take from their earnings and expend that amount on the deferred maintenance of the present year.

I assume we are all interested in having an adequate railroad system. At the present moment, instead of having 5 per cent or 6 per cent of cars and locomotives in bad order and unfit for use, there are 16 or 17 per cent of the cars and the engines in this country in bad order, unfit to be used. Sometime they must make these repairs and these replacements rendered absolutely necessary by the use of the property.

If you will deduct from the $600,000,000 of net income of the present year the $200,000,000 which should have been expended but which was not expended as a part of the cost of operation, you will have $400,000,000 of net income, or substantially that; $400,000,000 of net income for a property considered as a whole worth somewhere from $14,000,000,000 to $18,900,000,000.

Mr. President, making proper deductions for deferred maintenance, the railroads of this country, taken as a whole, through their earnings for the year 1921, are $75,000,000 short of the amount needed to pay the interest upon their bonds.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. DIAL. Has the Senator the figures to show about how many new miles of railroad were constructed during the last year and how many miles were abandoned?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am only speaking from a most general recollection. There was practically no new mileage constructed during the past year. There were possibly three or four hundred miles abandoned during the last year.

Mr. DIAL. That was true for the preceding year or two or three years, was it not?

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, yes.

Now, Mr. President, if we attempt to take off the millions, I care not how many—that is, it is only a matter of degree—if we take off fifty or sixty or seventy or eighty or ninety million dollars which were earned last year and which would not be earned the coming year for passenger service, what becomes of the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the investigation that it is now carrying on to ascertain whether it can reduce the freight rates and enable the farmers of the country to reach market at a price that will enable them to sell their products at something like cost of production?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator has stated that four-fifths of the railroads of the country in number have not earned operating expenses during the last year.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no; I did not so state. I think the Senator misunderstood me.

Mr. ROBINSON. What was the Senator's statement?

Mr. CUMMINS. I said four-fifths in number have not earned enough to pay the interest upon their bonds, and many of them have not earned operating expenses.

Mr. ROBINSON. If that condition continues indefinitely, of course the roads will be compelled to suspend operations.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. What is the remedy the Senator from Iowa proposes for that? Does the Senator think it can be accomplished and a remedy provided by an increase in the existing rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I do not.

Mr. ROBINSON. Is the Senator of opinion that the present rates are at the exact level that will produce the maximum revenue?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. The Senator from Arkansas does not know.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am convinced, however, that they are the rates which are diminishing revenue——

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely.

Mr. ROBINSON. And that if the rates were judiciously reduced the revenue would be increased. I admit that I am not possessed of technical knowledge respecting that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Before the Senator leaves the Chamber I wish to argue the matter a little with him face to face, because he is one of the most reasonable men I have ever had anything to do with.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know just what rates will produce the maximum revenue. The Interstate Commerce Commission has been endeavoring to ascertain that for a year, and it has adjusted rates accordingly. Under the present exigency, when it is clear to every reasonable man that the rates ought to be reduced to the point of even denying, if you please, any reward to all capital that may be invested in railroad companies, it is investigating the question of whether a reduction in rates will produce additional revenue—I mean additional net income, because additional revenue does not mean anything if the railroad companies must expend more in costs than the revenue received. The net income is the point at which we must finally arrive.

That is the very question which the Interstate Commerce Commission is now engaged in investigating. It is an exceedingly difficult question. It depends upon a survey of so many conditions that it is simply not possible for a Senator, who is engaged in a thousand other things, to reach any satisfactory conclusion upon it.

There have appeared before the Interstate Commerce Commission many distinguished men who have insisted and are insisting to the commission all the while that if the rates were reduced the increase in traffic would be sufficient to afford the railroad companies a greater revenue than they are now receiving. There is not a man of intelligence within the borders of the United States who will assert that the revenue of the railroad companies is now more than it ought to be.

There is not a lawyer in the United States who will assert that if the Interstate Commerce Commission did anything that reduced their revenues below the point at which they now stand the order of the commission would be sustained in any court. We only have to refer to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, of which there are very many, in order to be assured that this particular revenue which I have mentioned is an insufficient revenue for the railroad companies, taken as a whole.

I am appealing to Senators not to undertake to abolish the Interstate Commerce Commission and substitute their own immature and incomplete judgment with regard to the effect which a reduction of rates will have upon the revenues of the carriers. I am insisting that if we reduce the revenues of the carriers by the amount that under any reckoning will be occasioned by issuing mileage books at 2½ cents a mile it must result either in arresting any further reduction in freight rates or in an increase in freight rates if the commission believes that by an increase any additional revenue can be secured.

I have been working for months giving substantially all my time to the one object of reducing freight rates, for nobody knows better than I do the disastrous consequences of these high freight rates in my own State and in all that part of the country from which I come.

The Senator from Arkansas said yesterday—and he was repeating an argument often used for the bill—that if traveling salesmen could go out at 2½ cents a mile they could sell commodities, whereas now they can not go out and they can not sell them. Does anybody believe that any salesman, however persuasive, would be able to sell to the farmers of Iowa things they are not compelled to buy? The people of my own State are passing through a period of the most stringent economy. They will not buy anything from anybody if they can possibly avoid it; and why? There are many reasons, and chief among those reasons is that because of the deflation in the prices of agricultural products they have not anything with which to buy. If some bill were introduced here which would increase the price of the things which the farmers of my State have to sell, so that they might be put in possession of a surplus with which to buy, they would purchase without any difficulty, no matter what the traveling salesman had to pay for his transportation.

I hope Senators will remember the analysis the Senator from Virginia gave us with regard to the cause of our hard times, the cause that crippled the ability of men of all occupations to buy, that deprived them of purchasing power, and I remark again that selling these mileage books at 2½ cents a mile will not increase the purchasing power of the man who ultimately must create the market for commodities throughout the country.

I would like to see the traveling men riding at 2½ cents a mile. I myself would like to ride at 2½ cents a mile. I think everybody who travels would be glad to see the cost of travel reduced.

Take the case of the ordinary man in my own State, who does not buy mileage books and never has and never will, but who travels occasionally from place to place, as he sits side by side with a traveling salesman who is riding at 2½ cents a mile, whereas he is paying 3.6 cents or 3.8 cents or 4 cents per mile, depending upon whether he is riding in a Pullman or not. I should like to know how I could meet him and explain to him why we have given to one class of people the preference which we propose to give under the terms of the pending bill. The explanation is impossible. There is no excuse for it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator, in the amendment which he offered, does, however, propose to vest in the Interstate Commerce Commission power to give that very preference.

Mr. CUMMINS. No. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. He proposes to vest in them the power to compel the issuance of mileage books at a less rate than the person must pay who does not buy them.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I misunderstood the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I propose to give the Interstate Commerce Commission authority to compel railroad companies to issue mileage books good for not more than 5,000 nor less than 1,000 miles at a just and reasonable rate. That is all. I can conceive of reasons which would justify some difference between the general rate and the mileage-book rate, because there is, I can easily see, some lessened cost of service when one buys 2,000 or 5,000 miles of transportation as against a man who buys 20 or 25 miles of transportation. But I do not pretend to know what that difference would be, if any. It must be supported by such evidence as will show that it is not a discrimination against the man who uses the ordinary ticket.

I am sorry the Senator from Wisconsin did not quite gather the full import of my amendment. That is the very point I want to avoid. I want the discrimination, if there shall be one, based upon sound, economic reason, and there are some reasons that might influence the commission to issue a mileage book at a slightly less rate than the price of the ordinary ticket.

Mr. LENROOT. I understood the Senator to say it would be difficult for him to explain why a traveling man with a mileage book was permitted to ride at a less rate than one who did not have a mileage book. With the Senator's explanation it seems to me that result will still obtain; that he does contemplate that with this power reposed in the commission by his amendment the commission will have power to compel the sale of mileage books at a less rate than is charged the ordinary traveler who does not purchase them.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am assuming that men who ride on trains are ordinarily intelligent, and while they could easily perceive a justification for some difference in the rate, they would not be able to perceive a reason for a difference of 1 cent per mile in the rate.

It is exactly like moving freight in carload lots as distinguished from less than carload lots. The railroads move, and the Interstate Commerce Commission orders them to move, freight in carload lots at a cheaper rate per hundred pounds than the less than carload movement is carried for, but it must be a just and reasonable rate; it must be based upon, as I view it, the cost of the service in the two cases. So, Mr. President, I submit that it is the fair conclusion from the facts and conditions which surround us that if we pass this bill it will constitute a most serious obstacle in the way of a further reduction in freight rates.

I now desire to read another paragraph, possibly two paragraphs, of the letter from the Interstate Commerce Commission upon this subject. One of the questions contained in my letter to the Interstate Commerce Commission is as follows:

Fifth, your view as to the discrimination which results from the carriage of one person at 2.5 cents per mile and another at 3.6 cents per mile, with a surcharge for passengers using a Pullman car added. Obviously—there would be a discrimination, but whether unreasonable or unjust would depend upon the facts in each case. We have never held that mere discrepancies in the amounts charged constituted unjust discrimination, but have investigated cases involving alleged unjust discrimination to ascertain the circumstances and conditions under which the transportation was performed. If, as has been shown in some cases before us, it should appear that the passenger paying 2.5 cents a mile received substantially the same service as the passenger paying 3.6 cents a mile, plus Pullman surcharge, a case of unjust discrimination would be presented, in the absence of approval by the Congress.

Both the initial cost and the distance to be traversed would preclude the use of the 5,000-mile ticket by the ordinary person. Assuming that the transportation service performed is substantially the same as that furnished for the standard passenger fare, it would seem that the only basis for a distinction in price is the quantity of transportation purchased. If sound, this would, of course, warrant lower rates for large shippers than for their smaller competitors. The commission has, from the time it was created, opposed any rates based on what may be called the "wholesale" theory. In re Mileage Books (28 I. C. C., 318, 323) we called attention to the fact that, if it were not for the authorization in section 22 of the act, "it is debatable whether the concession from the regular fare made to the purchasers of mileage books would be lawful."

It may be appropriate to mention the fact that, while "mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets" are grouped together in section 22, excursion and commutation fares are ordinarily used in a service which is distinct in many particulars from the regular passenger service.

The seventh suggestion which I propounded in my letter to the Interstate Commerce Commission is as follows:

Seventh, any other comment which the commission feels disposed to make.

The commission says in answer to that:

It may be proper to remark that in the past bills somewhat similar to this one have been referred to us for our views and we have expressed our disapproval of them, not only on the grounds indicated but on account of the inadvisability, as it seems to us, of fixing rates or fares by statute.

It has seemed to us that when reductions in fares were warranted, they should be made in such a way that all travelers could benefit by them. The carriers in New England are now before us with a request for some readjustment of divisions which will give them additional revenues. Much of the revenue of the New England roads is derived from passenger traffic. In Proposed Increase in New England (40 I. C. C., 421) we said, page 443:

"There is probably no part of the country where the sale of mileage books on a substantially lower basis per mile than regular one-way fares has resulted in such flagrant abuses, such unjust discriminations, and such impairment of railroad revenues as in New England."

The bill in effect creates a privileged or favored class into which no one may enter who has not $125 available for the purpose. Whatever reduction in cost of travel is thus effected would inure not to those of small means who need it most but to those with abundant moneys in hand who need it least. The mileage ticket sought, at a rate of 2.5 cents per mile, would enable the holder to travel over the Southern Pacific line in Arizona or Nevada, where the base rate is 4.8 cents per mile, or over other lines in the State where the base rate is still higher—

I ought to remark here that when I said that the general rate is 3.6 cents per mile in most of the States or in most of the travel of the country, there are three or four States in the western section of the country, States in which railroad construction is exceedingly expensive and where the cost of operation and maintenance is very large, in which the passenger rate is much higher than 3.6 cents per mile—and in doing so to ride in Pullman cars without paying the so-called Pullman surcharge, which accrues to the rail carrier. His fellow passengers, sharing the same accommodations, would pay twice as much.

The bill does not declare the existing base fares to be unreasonable. It amends an act under which we have found them reasonable. But without any finding of that reasonableness which the act enjoins upon all rail carriers, it proposes to require them all to establish and maintain a much lower rate per mile for those who can afford to lay out $125 in order to secure it. It also provides that as the general rate of fare for the rest of the public is reduced from its present exceedingly high level, this special base shall be reduced in proportion, so that whatever happens the holders of these tickets shall always travel for less than anyone else.

I hope that Senators will remember that the bill, while it provides for modifications by the Interstate Commerce Commission upon application, yet whenever the base rate, the general level of passenger rates, is reduced it becomes the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce likewise to the same extent the mileage-book rates which are provided for in the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator please have printed in full in the RECORD the letter which he has read, so that we may read it in the morning?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will be very glad to do that, and I ask permission that it may be printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION,
Washington, January 11, 1922.

Hon. ALBERT B. CUMMINS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The commission has considered Senate bill No. 848, sent to Chairman McChord with your letter of January 3, and referred the matter to its legislative committee for reply. In response to your request this committee submits the following information:

"First, an estimate of the effect upon the revenues of the carriers for the year 1922, based upon the experience of 1920 and 1921."

The passenger revenue of steam roads included in the regular monthly reports amounted to $1,288,808,159 for the calendar year 1920. For 1921 the corresponding figure is estimated at $1,178,900,000 (estimated by increasing the actual figure for 10 months by 20 per cent). The average of the two years is $1,233,854,080. Of this, $32,828,600 may be taken as the Pullman surcharge and $56,750,000 is estimated as commutation revenue, leaving $1,144,275,480 as passenger revenue derived from fares other than commutation and surcharge. It is, of course, impossible to say what part of the traveling public would avail themselves of the proposed mileage books. The average revenue per passenger per mile, after excluding commutation and surcharge revenue, is about 3.3 cents. A reduction to 2.5 cents is a reduction of 8 mills or 24.2 per cent. What this percentage of reduction would amount to if applied to various assumed proportions of the total travel affected by the mileage books is shown below:

Proportion of $1,144,275,480 assumed to be affected.	Amount assumed to be affected.	24.2 per cent applied to figures in preceding column.
5 per cent	$57,213,774	$13,850,000
10 per cent	114,427,548	27,700,000
15 per cent	171,641,322	41,500,000
20 per cent	228,855,096	55,400,000
25 per cent	286,068,870	69,200,000

As against the possible losses shown in the last column of the preceding table, there would be the gain from new travel, if any, created by the reduced rates.

"Second, a table showing the passenger rates throughout the country, including the surcharge for passengers traveling in Pullman cars:

Average revenue per passenger per mile, including the surcharge, but excluding commutation traffic.

"Third, the validity and practicability of using the interchangeable tickets between points within a State."

There has always been considerable dispute as to whether or not Congress can prescribe, or authorize the commission to prescribe, the intrastate rates or fares of interstate carriers except when necessary in order to protect interstate commerce or persons or localities engaged in interstate commerce. Whatever may ultimately be held to be the law on this score, the present law was framed, and has been interpreted, on the theory that it forbids interference with intrastate rates and fares which do not adversely affect interstate rates and fares. It seems very doubtful if the insertion of the provisions in the bill, without revision of the rest of the statute, will afford a valid basis for prescribing purely intrastate rates of interstate carriers.

"Fourth, is the provision authorizing the commission to 'increase or decrease such rate directly in proportion, as nearly as the commission deems practicable, to such alteration in such average rate level' workable?"

This provision would amount to prescribing a relationship between the mileage ticket and the average passenger fare. It seems probable that this provision could be carried out substantially as Congress intended in case other features of the bill are held valid. It is not clear whether the order of the commission modifying the rate of 2½ cents a mile is to be made after full hearing, or what passenger fares—i. e., standard, mileage, commutation, excursion—are to be considered in ascertaining the average level.

"Fifth, your view as to the discrimination which results from the carriage of one person at 2½ cents per mile and another at 3.6 cents per mile, with surcharge for passengers using a Pullman car added."

Obviously there would be a discrimination, but whether unreasonable or unjust would depend upon the facts in each case. We have never held that mere discrepancies in the amounts charged constituted unjust discrimination, but have investigated cases involving alleged unjust discrimination to ascertain the circumstances and conditions under which the transportation was performed. If, as has been shown in some cases before us, it should appear that the passenger paying 2½ cents a mile received substantially the same service as the passenger paying 3.6 cents a mile, plus Pullman surcharge, a case of unjust discrimination would be presented, in the absence of approval by the Congress.

Both the initial cost and the distance to be traversed would preclude the use of the 5,000-mile ticket by the ordinary person. Assuming that the transportation service performed is substantially the same as that furnished for the standard passenger fare, it would seem that the only basis for a distinction in price is the quantity of transportation purchased. If sound, this would, of course, warrant lower rates for large shippers than for their smaller competitors. The commission has, from the time it was created, opposed any rates based on what may be called the "wholesale" theory. In re Mileage Books (28 I. C. C., 318, 323), we called attention to the fact that if it were not for the authorization in section 22 of the act, "it is debatable whether the concession from the regular fare made to the purchasers of mileage books would be lawful."

It may be appropriate to mention the fact that, while "mileage, excursion, or commutation passenger tickets" are grouped together in section 22, excursion and commutation fares are ordinarily used in a service which is distinct in many particulars from the regular passenger service.

"Sixth, what additional accounting expense as between the railroad companies would be involved?

This can not be estimated with any accuracy, as it would depend upon some elements which are purely speculative.

"Seventh, any other comment which the commission feels disposed to make."

It may be proper to remark that in the past bills somewhat similar to this one have been referred to us for our views, and we have expressed our disapproval of them, not only on the grounds indicated but on account of the inadvisability, as it seems to us, of fixing rates or fares by statute.

It has seemed to us that when reductions in fares were warranted they should be made in such a way that all travelers could benefit by them. The carriers in New England are now before us with a request for some readjustment of divisions which will give them additional revenues. Much of the revenue of the New England roads is derived from passenger traffic. In proposed increases in New England (49 I. C. C., 421), we said, page 443:

"There is probably no part of the country where the sale of mileage books on a substantially lower basis per mile than regular one-way fares has resulted in such flagrant abuses, such unjust discriminations, and such impairment of railroad revenues as in New England."

The bill, in effect, creates a privileged or favored class into which no one may enter who has not $125 available for the purpose. Whatever reduction in cost of travel is thus effected would inure, not to those of small means, who need it most, but to those with abundant moneys in hand, who need it least. The mileage ticket sought at a rate of 2.5 cents per mile would enable the holder to travel over the Southern Pacific line in Arizona or Nevada, where the base rate is 4.8 cents per mile, or over other lines in the State where the base rate is still higher, and in doing so to ride in Pullman cars without paying the so-called Pullman surcharge, which accrues to the rail carrier. His fellow passengers, sharing the same accommodations, would pay twice as much.

The bill does not declare the existing base fares to be unreasonable. It amends an act under which we have found them reasonable. But, without any finding of that reasonableness which the act enjoins upon all rail carriers, it proposes to require them all to establish and maintain a much lower rate per mile for those who can afford to lay out $125 in order to secure it. It also provides that as the general rate of fare for the rest of the public is reduced from its present exceptionally high level this special base shall be reduced in proportion, so that, whatever happens, the holders of these tickets shall always travel for less than anyone else.

The bill disregards the fact that the President, through the director general, determined that a base rate lower than 3 cents per mile was too low and that the commission has since authorized 20 per cent increase in that base rate.

It further raises the question whether any rail carrier subject to the act could justify any base higher than 2.5 cents per mile for any passenger after this bill should become law.

The bill repeals portions of section 22 of the interstate commerce act, which provide for compliance with section 6 of that act in respect of the filing and publication of joint tariffs and which make applicable the penalties provided under section 10 of that act.

The bill lays its obligation to sell and honor these interchangeable mileage tickets upon "each common carrier by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, within the continental United States, subject to this act," and thus upon common carriers which now publish no passenger tariffs and carry no passenger traffic.

The ticket may be issued and all the money collected by a carrier which does not participate in the transportation and is financially irresponsible.

These are some of the obvious defects of the bill.

In conclusion your attention is invited to Lake Shore, etc., Railway Co. v. Smith (173 U. S., 684), where the Supreme Court held that it was unconstitutional for the State of Michigan, after prescribing certain maximum fares, to require the sale of mileage tickets at a considerably lower rate per mile.

Very truly, yours,

JOHN J. ESCH.
(For Legislative Committee)
Commissioner.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, Mr. President, briefly I desire to call attention to what actually has happened with regard to passenger travel. I believe it will be helpful if Senators will become familiar with the following figures relating to the passenger traffic:

In 1917 the number of passenger miles, as reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission, was 39,476,858,549. That means the number of miles which all the passengers carried by the railroad companies traveled; that is, the number of passengers carried by the railroad companies a single mile.

In 1918—and in the meantime passenger fares had risen to 3 cents per mile—the number of passenger miles was 42,676,579,199. That is an increase of more than 3,000,000,000 miles.

In 1919 the number had risen to 46,358,303,740.

In 1920, during 10 months of which the railroads were under private control and operation, the number of passenger miles had risen to 46,848,657,987.

In 1921, with the last two months estimated, the passenger miles had fallen to 38,675,228,000. I have no doubt that the decreased travel in 1921 was partially due to the increased passenger rates, but negligibly so. The increase in passenger rates was not the chief reason for the decrease in passenger travel. A collapse of business came in this country in the fall of 1920 and everything stopped. Business of all kinds diminished at an alarming and disastrous rate; and the people are not traveling so much, partly because some of those who formerly traveled can not afford to travel at all, but largely because there is no occasion for the journeys which they formerly made. Can you wonder why the farmers of my State are not traveling as they used to travel? It is not because of the passenger rates so much as it is because they can not sell what they produce for a price that reimburses them for the cost of production. Too few people want our corn and our hogs and our cattle; and the problem of America, as well as of the world, is first to restore the relation of commodities and prices, and, second, to restore the buying power of the world as well as of the United States.

In that readjustment prices will be reduced, passenger rates will be reduced, freight rates will be reduced; but it is so obvious that it is the duty of the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce freight rates before they reduce passenger rates that it seems to be established the moment it is stated. All I am asking is that this matter be referred to the Interstate Commerce Commission with authority to require all railroads to issue interchangeable mileage books at a just rate, precisely as it has authority to establish freight rates, and that we shall not attempt to hamper and embarrass the commission in the performance of the most important work in which it has ever engaged.

Moreover, if the railroads are compelled to issue passenger tickets good for 5,000 miles, and even if the amendment which the Senator from Arkansas suggests be made, namely, making these tickets good only for interstate travel, instead of making them good between points within a State, how, without an elaborate plan, can any such provision be enforced?

Suppose a traveler with one of those tickets takes the train at Philadelphia. How is the conductor to tell whether he is going to use it upon an interstate journey or upon a State journey? Suppose he stops for a day at Harrisburg, and another day at Pittsburgh, and then goes on to Chicago, what will be the regulations which will surround the use of that ticket in Pennsylvania?

The bill as it is framed in that respect, even if it be modified as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas, is unworkable. If we issue a mileage book good only for interstate travel, we shall be compelled to surround that mileage book with the most elaborate system of rules and regulations in order to prevent its being used in intrastate travel instead of interstate travel. I suggest this as another reason why it is absolutely necessary to commit this question to the Interstate Commerce Commission, rather than to attempt to formulate for ourselves and in this way the regulations under which such tickets can be used.

Mr. President, I have consumed a great deal more time than I intended to, and I repeat a statement which I made a few moments ago:

I am not opposing this bill because I do not believe in this form of transportation; I am opposing it because I think it ought to be accomplished through the medium of the Interstate Commerce Commission rather than through direct legislation; and it ought to be accomplished, if at all, with due regard to its effect upon the transportation of commodities in which the people are primarily interested; and it ought to be accomplished upon a reasonable and fair basis, for the discrimination has been laid by testimony offered to the commission; and that body alone, so far as the present composition of our Government is concerned, is qualified to determine at what rate mileage books of the kind described in the amendment I have proposed should be issued.

I hope that it is not the purpose of Congress to depart from a long-established policy—a policy which, in my judgment, has served the people of this country with remarkable effect. I understand how difficult it is for the commission now to meet the wishes of all the people of the United States. We are passing through a period of adjustment. We are experiencing the consequences of the war, and even the Infinite One can not relieve us from all of those consequences. The amendment I have offered affords to this very worthy and esteemed class of our people all the relief to which they are fairly entitled, and I earnestly hope it will be adopted.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is the desire on this side to adjourn before 4 o'clock; and I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the order, which I send to the desk. Then, if no one else desires to speak, I shall move an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed order.

The order was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] be excused from further service as chairman of the Committee on Pensions and assigned to the chairmanship of the Committee on Finance; and that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] be excused from further service on the Committee on Military Affairs and assigned to service on the Committee on Finance.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] desires to address the Senate. I wish he would arrange to stop a little before 4 o'clock, as we desire to adjourn about 10 minutes of 4.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I shall probably occupy only 5 or 10 minutes.

Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment that I propose to the pending bill. The amendment proposes that the provisions of the bill shall apply to mileage books of 1,000 miles instead of 5,000 miles.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 11, it is proposed to strike out the word "five," and in lieu thereof to insert the word "one."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am heartily in sympathy with the object sought by this bill. I believe that there should be some reduction of the rates for passenger transportation, and that if that can be accomplished under the provisions of this measure we shall have performed a service worth while in the interest of the American traveling public. I do not believe, however, that it should be restricted to mileage books in denominations of 5,000 miles. If we only authorize mileage books for this amount we shall in a very large degree preclude from the benefits of this measure every one except big business concerns and people having ample means to invest as much as $125 at a time in a mileage book.

Prior to the abolishing of the mileage-book privilege, as we all know, the railroads maintained a policy of issuing mileage books in denominations of 1,000 miles or 2,000 or 5,000 miles.

Under a policy of that kind the average person doing any traveling of any consequence receives the benefit of the privilege of purchasing a mileage book at a reduced rate. I think that if we are going to reestablish this privilege of mileage books, we should not select a favored class, those who are carrying on extensive business, having their agents do extensive traveling, or those with ample means to buy mileage books, and extend the privilege to them only. That will be the inevitable consequence if the privilege is extended only to mileage books of 5,000 miles or more.

I submit the amendment with a view to restoring the policy that formerly existed under the voluntary operations of the railroads. I believe that it is a proper policy, and that the measure should be enacted; but if we are to enact a law of this character, then I believe that we should provide for mileage books in denominations of 1,000 miles or more, and not begin at 5,000 miles.

Quite a good deal has been said about leaving this matter to the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I see no reason why the Congress should longer go upon the idea that we must leave to the Interstate Commerce Commission the adjustment of all these problems. What is the history of the State railroad commissions in dealing with this question of passenger transportation? We found in a great many States that the railroad commission of the State did not prescribe as low a rate for passenger transportation as it seemed to the public that conditions justified. On account of the failure of these commissions in some instances—I do not say all of them—to take action providing for more reasonable transportation charges for the traveling public, the legislatures in a great many States have enacted laws prescribing specifically passenger rates. Among the cases that were quite noted in the South was the Alabama Rate case.

Take the condition in Alabama: The railroads, especially the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, had resisted and resisted an order of the railroad commission prescribing a rate of 2½ cents per mile. So long had the railroads, by first one delay and then another in the courts, defeated the railroad commission in its order for a reduction in the rates that the Alabama Legislature enacted a law prescribing a rate of 2½ cents a mile. That was contested in the courts, and the courts sustained the act and held that the legislative branch of the Government possessed the necessary power to prescribe these rates. The railroads contended that they were confiscatory. The court held, upon that point, that unless it prima facie appeared, upon the face of the measure itself, that the rates were confiscatory the railroads would have to give them a fair test and operate under them, and by operation establish they were confiscatory, before they could seek and procure relief of the court.

I am not familiar with the intricacies of the railroad transportation problems, but I know that in the minds of many trained, experienced, and able railroad officials there is an idea and a belief that a reasonable rate induces and encourages a greater volume of business, and that by reducing the rate the railroad does not only increase its income but, of course, contributes to the general prosperity of the patrons of the railroad.

I recall that some years ago in the State of Georgia the Central of Georgia, if I remember correctly, decided that although the railroad commission fixed a maximum rate of 3 cents a mile, that system would inaugurate a 2½ cents a mile rate, with a view to giving better rates to the public and with the belief that these more reasonable transportation charges would encourage a greater volume of business. The experience of the Central of Georgia thoroughly convinced the officials of that road that the policy was a wise one, as it resulted in a large increase in the volume of travel and brought a greater revenue to the corporation.

We had a similar experience in my own State. For a great many years the railroad commission had prescribed a maximum rate of 3 cents per mile. There was a public clamoring for a reduction in passenger rates. The railroads voluntarily reduced the rates to 2¾ cents per mile, stating that they would try out the policy of charging a smaller rate with the hope that it would stimulate business and increase the income of the railroads, and their experience was so satisfactory that never until the Government took over the railroads during the war did those railroads increase their rates again.

Mr. President, I believe that a more reasonable charge for passenger travel will result beneficially to the railroads, and most assuredly will result beneficially and helpfully to the traveling public, and I hope this measure will be enacted.

I believe, however, that the measure would be improved and that it would come nearer meeting the situation if the amendment which I have proposed should be agreed to. If this amendment should be adopted, then the privilege of a mileage book will apply to mileage books of 1,000 miles and larger amounts. Certainly the mileage-book privilege should be reestablished.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 20, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 19, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Blessed Lord, we would pause long enough to hear Thee say: "Thy sins be forgiven thee." Bless us with a fine discernment that we may not get our values confused or our standards lowered. May the spirit of truth invade our lives at every point. In the hour of perplexity help us with the consciousness that the weakness of God is stronger than the might of man, and that the more sweetly human we act the more thoroughly divine we are. To the sick give comfort; to the sorrowing give rest; to the doubting give trust; to the burdened give relief; and to us all give concentration of labor and consecration of spirit. We ask in the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its chief clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2799. An act to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 30. A joint resolution to amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines a preferred right of homestead entry," approved February 14, 1920.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 2708. An act to authorize the President to transfer certain medical supplies for the relief of the distressed and famine stricken people of Russia.

S. 2776. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge over the Columbia River at a point approximately 5 miles upstream from Dalles City, Wasco County, in the State of Oregon, to a point on the opposite shore in the State of Washington.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 2799. An act to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to incorporate the North River Bridge Co. and to authorize the construction of a bridge and approaches at New York City across the Hudson River, to regulate commerce in and over such bridge between the States of New York and New Jersey, and to establish such bridge a military and post road," approved July 11, 1890; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPORT OF JOINT COMMISSION OF AGRICULTURAL INQUIRY.

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, I call up from the Speaker's table House concurrent resolution 37, authorizing the printing of 50,000 additional copies of parts 1 and 2 of House Document No. 408, being the report of the Joint Commission of Agricultural Inquiry, with a Senate amendment thereto, and move to concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Clerk reported the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. This is a technical mistake.

Mr. KIESS. It is changing the word "document" to the word "report." It was an error on the part of the House committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request made a day or two ago for a change of reference of the bill S. 5, to amend an act approved February 28, 1899, entitled "An act relative to the payment of claims for material and labor furnished for District of Columbia buildings," from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It was at the suggestion of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that I withdrew the request temporarily. It was manifestly an oversight that it was referred to our committee, as it clearly belongs to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the bill S. 5 be rereferred from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee) there were—ayes 77, noes 7.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 345, nays 1, answered "present" 1, not voting 83, as follows:

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea," but I understand the gentleman from Florida [Mr. CLARK], with whom I am paired, is not present, and therefore I withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9981, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of the consideration of the bill H. R. 9981, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive, and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman what disposition he proposes to make of the time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee that I have some four hours——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was not speaking with reference to that, but more particularly with reference to the control of the time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The time will be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] on your side.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is understood?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] is recognized for one hour.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the bill now before us for consideration is known as an appropriation bill for the independent offices, under the new arrangement providing for the consideration of appropriation bills. It carries with it the appropriation for some 21 independent establishments. These establishments heretofore were provided for by appropriations, in the most part, through the legislative appropriation bill, some of them through the sundry civil bill, and some of them through the various deficiency bills.

The total estimate suggested to the committee by the budgetary in this bill amounts to $503,833,713. In addition to this, there is a permanent and indefinite appropriation amounting to $6,017,000. The amount recommended to be appropriated by your committee is $494,304,238. That is, $108,297,590 more than the total appropriations for these same activities for 1922, and it is $9,529,475 less than the amount requested in the estimates and recommended by the Budget. This excess of $108,297,590 is made up practically in its entirety by two items, one comprising $80,000,000 and odd for the Veterans' Bureau, the other comprising, in round numbers, $26,000,000 for the Shipping Board. When I reach those two activities I will explain more in detail the necessity for this increase. I will say now in passing that, in so far as this item that applies to the Shipping Board is concerned, it does not represent an increase, for the reason that if the recommendation made by your committee is carried out there will be nothing in this bill for reconditioning of vessels, where in the last bill providing for this service there was some $73,000,000 appropriated. But in this bill we are recommending $50,000,000 be appropriated for the purpose of paying off claims. These are not claims arising out of the operation of the Shipping Board at the present time.

They are claims that were created and consummated completely before the present administration had anything to do with the management of the Shipping Board, and this $50,000,000 is for the purpose of paying debts of the United States, and can not, in consequence, be legitimately considered as a part of the operating expense of the Shipping Board, and instead of its being an addition, if you will compare the appropriation for operating expenses this year with the same item of last year, it will show a saving in that item of a little more than $23,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman want to yield for a question now or later?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I might as well yield now.

Mr. SNELL. Can you tell us something about the amount of the claims that are made or are being made on the Shipping Board, and how much we will have to arrange to appropriate for?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will enter on that in just a minute. I wish to say in passing that there seems to be an erroneous idea with reference to the relations that the budgetary occupies to this Congress. And I think it well, so far as the public is concerned, that we make a declaration now as to the policy of the Congress with reference to the recommendations submitted by the Budget. In doing this, I wish to say that, in my opinion, the greatest agency for the economic administration of the Government that has been instituted since the formation of this Government is this new scheme of the Budget, but it does not do all of the things that the public seem to think it will do. It is not binding upon the Congress. It is purely advisory. It is an agency of the Congress, going into these various spending activities for the purpose of ascertaining as nearly as it can what their wants are and what the appropriation should be, in their judgment. The Congress should be thankful for that previous investigation, and I know are mindful that in their deliberations it can not be and should never be bound by its recommendations. To do this would be to surrender the right of the Congress of the United States to a subordinate agency.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. TILSON. Is it not intended rather that it would be of a supervisory nature? Is it not an executive department that has to go over the estimates of the executive departments and determine whether or not they should be as they are, taking a broad view of all the executive departments rather than the single view of one?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is correct. It has been the policy of the committee having this bill in charge—and I think it is the policy of the general committee—that unless there is an exceptional reason why we should make appropriations exceeding the amounts of the recommendations of the Budget, such appropriations should not be made. On the other hand, this committee having this bill in charge, and I think that every other subcommittee having appropriation bills in charge, will feel that they are perfectly free, acting upon the advice coming from the Budget, together with the additional advice that they may receive by reason of their public hearings and the testimony had before their committee, to make reductions in addition to the recommendations submitted by the Budget. We have done that in this bill to the amount of very nearly $10,000,000. In other words, the recommendations that we are submitting to you and asking you to confirm are very nearly $10,000,000 less than the recommendations submitted by the Budget.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman a moment ago spoke about appropriating for the Shipping Board. I do not understand the provisions of the bill in that respect. On page 28 of the bill, in line 8, if the gentleman will kindly turn to that portion of the bill, the amount appropriated reads as follows:

(a) the amount on hand July 1, 1922; (b) $50,000,000.

How much was that amount on hand, and how is it now carried?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will permit, I will proceed now to discuss the Shipping Board. I will state to the gentlemen of the committee——

Mr. HOCH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a general question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HOCH. The gentleman has stated that the committee has reduced the estimates of the Budget Bureau nearly $10,000,000. Can the gentleman state how much the Budget Bureau reduced the estimates submitted to it before transmitting those estimates?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. They reduced the estimates submitted to them by the various activities comprised within this bill many hundreds of thousands of dollars. I do not think there is a single instance where they did not reduce the estimates presented to them by the heads of these various departments.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. Will the gentleman mind telling the committee at this time on what items those reductions were made below the estimates?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will permit, that can be done better in the discussion under the five-minute rule. I will state, however, in passing, that we reduced the estimates of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and we reduced the Housing Corporation estimates, and we reduced the Shipping Board estimates. In fact, we made reductions, as you will see if you will read the report on this bill, in nearly every one of the activities that are considered in this measure.

Now, in regard to this Shipping Board. First, I wish to call your attention to the principal items that are carried in this bill by way of appropriations. We are first recommending $50,000,000 for operating expenses. Congress must take into consideration the fact that this is a business peculiar in itself. There is not another activity with which the United States Government is now engaged that can be compared with the Shipping Board. We are conducting the biggest business that was ever conducted upon the face of the earth. I would have you bear that in mind. The United States Steel Corporation and the Inland Steel Corporation are looked upon as being most gigantic individual businesses conducted by men. Yet they are insignificant as compared with the magnitude of this Shipping Board business. As I stated, we appropriated $50,000,000 for the purpose of conducting the business, to be added to what may come in by reason of the conduct of that business. Whether or not that $50,000,000 will be needed will be problematical, dependent, if you please, upon the carrying trade in the next fiscal year.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I would like to know whether those ships that are being operated by the Shipping Board are yielding any profit to the Government?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are not, except some passenger-carrying ships. There is not a ship line on the face of the earth to-day that is yielding a profit. There are but few great businesses in this country to-day that are yielding a profit. Men are keeping up their overhead, keeping their organizations intact, hoping that the time will speedily come when they can turn a loss account into a profit account; and that condition is not peculiar to the Shipping Board.

The Shipping Board in the conduct of this business is not peculiar except in so far as it is a governmental agency instead of a private agency, and its loss is probably due to the fact that the Government can not get anything done as cheaply as a private agency can. In that respect the loss may be comparatively greater than it otherwise would be in proportion to the size of the undertaking.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman discuss the expenses of the Shipping Board, or will the gentleman answer that later on?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. As I was saying, your committee in making this provision of $50,000,000 for the conduct of the business of the Shipping Board for the next fiscal year based on our estimate on what is occurring now. This business for many, many months was conducted at a loss of more than $8,000,000 per month. That loss has been reduced now so that it is something over $3,000,000, running between $3,000,000 and $4,000,000. It may be a little greater; it may be a little less; we are hoping that it may be less during the next fiscal year. But we can take no chance if this business is to be conducted. They must have the money with which to conduct it. Estimating that the loss will not be greater than it now is, $50,000,000 will cover the possible deficiency under the earnings and receipts of that concern. If it were to continue as it is to-day there would be a little saving out of this $50,000,000, for it is running now practically at the rate of $4,000,000 per month loss, so that if that were carried out until the end of the fiscal year the loss through operation would amount to $48,000,000.

Now, then, we have recommended $50,000,000 for the purpose of paying claims, and I invite the closest scrutiny of the members of this committee to the hearings upon this very subject, in order that you may determine not only what is best for the Shipping Board but what is best for those who have these claims pending before the Shipping Board.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan. I hope he will make his question as short as he can.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have formed the impression in some way or other that the affairs of the Shipping Board are in such a confused condition that they are incapable of being audited.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If gentlemen will let me state this in my own way, I will come to all these things. I can not state it all in a minute. This big business affair is not susceptible of being covered in a few sentences. The fact of the business is that the Shipping Board was so badly managed that it has taken months and months to get even the information that I am trying in a very meager way to convey to you.

When I was interrupted I was talking about the $50,000,000 for the purpose of paying off claims. There are pending against the Shipping Board $240,000,000 worth of claims. Some of them are just and some of them are unjust. Some of these claims have been adjusted. As to some of them there has been no attempt at adjustment, and they are now pending in the Court of Claims, where they will have to take their course and be determined by the result of suits.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that an appropriation of $40,000,000 for the settlement of such claims, made some two or three years ago, has never been exhausted, because there were not that many claims approved?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; there never was anything appropriated for the settlement of claims against this Shipping Board. This is the first time any attempt has been made of any appropriation for this board for the settlement of claims, according to my information. Here is the situation: The Shipping Board has organized within itself a claims commission for the purpose of informing those who are responsible of the exact condition concerning these claims.

As a consequence they have absolutely refused to settle those claims about which there is doubt or as to which the Shipping Board think they have a chance at least of reducing them. Many of these claims are perfectly plain on the face of them, are indisputable, and agreements have been arrived at through the mediation of this commission as to the amounts that are actually due on those claims. The claimants are scattered all over this country, and they represent almost every character of business. Many of these concerns are hanging on by their eyebrows to-day, and a few dollars to them at this time will be worth more in the keeping up of their business than two or three times that amount at the end of the disposition of these claims in the Court of Claims. There are about $140,000,000 of claims of this character about which there is no dispute, or little dispute, and upon which agreements may be arrived at, concerning which the claimants are willing to make concessions in order that they may have the immediate use of the money to which they are entitled in order that they may keep their business running. We think it is not only due the Government, in order that it may have the best possible advantage in settling these just claims, but it is also due the claimants themselves, in order that they may be saved from bankruptcy, that opportunity be afforded the Shipping Board to settle those claims that are undisputed. In consequence we are recommending the appropriation of $50,000,000 for this purpose. It came to us in a supplemental estimate at the suggestion of the President of the United States during the deliberations of your committee, and with $30,000,000 of that sum immediately available it is the opinion of the Shipping Board that more than three times the amount of $50,000,000 may be settled that should be settled, which will result in a saving of $100,000,000 to the Government, and result, if you please, in preventing the bankruptcy of many of the business concerns of the United States.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. The $50,000,000 stated by the gentleman, however, does not entirely adjust these claims?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

Mr. DOWELL. There will be a further demand for further appropriations on these claims?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. When the claims which are pending in the Court of Claims have been adjudicated, of course we will have to provide for their payment.

Mr. DOWELL. But does this $50,000,000 apply to any of those claims which are pending in the Court of Claims?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it does not.

Mr. DOWELL. But as I understand the gentleman, there are more than $50,000,000 of claims that are undisputed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; there are between $135,000,000 and $140,000,000 of those claims.

Mr. DOWELL. Then, as I understand it, the balance of that $140,000,000 is left unadjusted.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it is hoped that with this $50,000,000 they can wipe out $140,000,000 of claims.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it the expectation of the Appropriations Committee that this $50,000,000 will settle in toto the entire $140,000,000 to which he has referred?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Just as far as they can possibly settle them.

Mr. DOWELL. Is that the intention of the Committee on Appropriations, to adjust these claims by paying $50,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is the intention of the committee, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, to place in the hands of the Shipping Board this amount of money, giving them the discretion to settle valid claims concerning which reductions may be voluntarily made, and the Shipping Board claim that in this way more than $125,000,000 can be settled with $50,000,000.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] got the impression that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has information that there are $130,000,000 or $140,000,000 of undisputed claims. That is not so, of course?

Mr. DOWELL. That was my understanding of the gentleman's statement.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The amounts are not undisputed. There is something due on all these claims, but the amount is subject to adjustment.

Mr. DOWELL. Then I misunderstood the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman state in a very few words what is the general character of most of these large claims against the Shipping Board at the present time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are for shipbuilding material, they are for the building of ships, they are for the furnishing of supplies of all kinds, they are for almost every conceivable thing, ranging in amount from a few hundred dollars up to millions. I wish that the members of this Committee of the Whole would take the time to read the hearings submitted upon this Shipping Board proposition. This is the first time since the formation of the Shipping Board that this Congress has had anything that approached an intelligent survey of this wonderful establishment. There have been more than five directors of this Shipping Board since the inauguration of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. There has been confusion worse confounded from its inception down to about a year ago, when out of this chaos these gentlemen came and undertook to reduce it to order. Now they come and lay their cards on the table, and the head of each establishment within the Shipping Board has brought to your committee for your use all the facts and have presented them as nearly as they can gather them out of this confusion. If there is one of us that is not informed after this hearing, it is our fault and not the fault of the Shipping Board.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. As I understand the gentleman, it is the purpose to settle $140,000,000 of claims with $50,000,000, on account of the dire needs of the claimants. Is that the proposition?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That enters into it. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that that is one criticism that can be made against the United States Government, that we do not do right by our people. But in doing this thing we are going to save many of these men from bankruptcy. If we do not do it, as I say, many will have to go into bankruptcy. Here is the Shipping Board that is alive to the situation pending in this country, and they insist on the settlement of these claims. If they have no authority, they can not settle them, but if they have authority they may settle them. If they do not settle them, the only recourse for the claimants is to go into the Court of Claims and wend their weary way through that court.

Mr. HUDSPETH. If these are just claims, why not appropriate $140,000,000 and pay them off?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There are some subtractions, some adjustments, that may be had and some doubt about some of them, and if there is doubt the Government should have the benefit of the doubt. The men in charge of prudential affairs of the Government are charged with two responsibilities—the first, as agents of the Government, they must subserve the interest of the Government, and, second, they are the agents of the people and must subserve their interests. If we would say to this board, "Here is $140,000,000"—if we were to give them $140,000,000 carte blanche to pay the whole thing, the criticism would go on the other hand, and it would be said that if we let them go into the Court of Claims the amounts would be reduced.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Would it not be better to have the claims adjusted before the appropriation is made? We would have a better opportunity to settle them by having this proposed statement of how much the claims are and have them adjusted and know just how much we are appropriating. Under this item they may appropriate $50,000,000 and it may settle only $50,000,000 worth of claims out of the $140,000,000 of claims and leave the balance unadjusted. Why should we not have the proposition of what it will amount to before we make the appropriation?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me say to the gentleman from Iowa that every lawyer who has attempted to settle claims knows that if the client has money he can make a settlement, but if the client has no money the claimant will not bother to go into an adjustment. If the Shipping Board has the money, it can call the claimant, sit down and discuss the claim, and reach a conclusion, but if the client knows that he has got to wait until some future time for Congress to make an appropriation, he is not going to make a settlement or adjustment.

Mr. DOWELL. Our experience with the Shipping Board is that they have been very easy in the payment of claims, irrespective of the justice.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The fact is, until July of this year the Shipping Board that preceded the present board permitted the claims to accumulate and settled very few.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is absolutely correct. It resolves itself down to this proposition. We have organized the Shipping Board with a certain purpose in view. They found a deplorable condition. They are trying the best they can to work their way out of it. They have suggested this as one of the possible ways out, and your committee has acquiesced after the fullest possible hearings—and I hope the gentleman will read the hearings, and I am sure if the gentleman from Iowa had been sitting with us he would have concluded that this is the best thing to do, not only for those immediately entitled to the money, but infinitely best for the Government. We must have a little faith. I know that much that has transpired has tended to destroy the faith in men who have had charge of this situation, but that was due to war conditions. We are coming back when the people must have confidence. If the hour comes in a time of peace when the people of the country have no confidence in our officers of government, then it is good-by to a republican form of government. Then it is good-by to the best Government ever formed for the best interests of men and women.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It has been stated by all those familiar with the claims that many are wholly unfounded and many others grossly exaggerated. On that point I want to read from the statement of Mr. Lasker at the hearings. He said:

> In this connection may I state that, of course, it will not take anything like $219,000,000 to settle these claims. It is well known that a man or concern in making a claim against the Government adds in everything anybody else owes him and everything he owes anybody else. When that is all added up, he adds in the date for good measuse; then when he gets through with that he multiplies it by six, or whatever number occurs to him, and then you have his claim.

That will be found on page 904 of the hearings. Now, my observation in these matters is that there is more occasion for the Members of the House to be concerned about the interests of the Government than there is for the interests of the claimant. The chairman of the Shipping Board testified before the Merchant Marine Committee that under the authority previously given they were settling all claims upon which they could agree, and had settled numerous claims, and most of those that have not been settled—because they were settling out of the proceeds of operation, sale, and so forth—were claims of men who were unwilling to take what the authorities and the board thought was proper compensation. As the gentleman has suggested, they have the right to go into the Court of Claims in any event, and claims to the extent of $62,000,000 have already gone there, and those who remain on the outside, who are asking for more liberal legislation, are men whose claims are generally not based on any legal or contractual liability. I think that $50,000,000, in view of the testimony in this case, is too much to appropriate to settle the claims.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think if the gentleman will read the hearings all the way through, he will change his opinion.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Oh, I have read the hearings.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman has read those hearings entirely since he got them, then he did not sleep a wink last night, because he got them just yesterday evening. The gentleman can not have read them all. This is the proposition: It is either to do what the gentleman is suggesting, to bankrupt a whole lot of his people and mine, or else give the management of the Shipping Board a little bit of discretion and save these people from bankruptcy. If we throw all of these cases into the Court of Claims, they have a right to establish everything that they can get and, of course, will do that. On the other hand, these men would rather accept 50 cents on the dollar of what they know to be their right to-day than to wait 5 or 10 years to get it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. They ought to be paid every dollar justly and legally due them, and not 50 cents on the dollar.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. How would the gentleman do it?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I would do it differently from the plan proposed here.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; but how would he do it?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I would have a proper tribunal to adjudicate these matters and not let the men themselves determine what was to be paid them.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is exactly what they have done, so that if the gentleman will read the hearings through he will find that he will be in entire accord with the board's plan. They have, for the very purpose of doing the thing the gentleman has suggested, established a claims commission. Let us suppose Mr. DAVIS is the attorney for the Shipping Board. Somebody comes with a claim. He, as attorney, is a partisan, because lawyers are always partisans in behalf of their clients. He formulates his opinion, actuated by what he thinks to be right. Through his partisanship, however, he sides possibly unjustly against the claimant. That the claimant may have exact justice and for the purpose of doing the thing the gentleman would like to have done, they have organized a claims commission composed of some of the most eminent lawyers in the country, selected by reason of their known experience and their desire to do what is right. They will say to the claimant, "Our man says that you are entitled to only so much. He may be wrong. You may be right. If you are willing to go before this claims commission and arbitrate this business, we will see if we can not arrive at a conclusion agreeable to all concerned." It is not binding on the Shipping Board without its additional approval, but it is in the nature of a judicial decision rendered by this claims commission. There never was a better attempt made to protect the interests of the Government and do justice to the claimant.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. They have formed this commission of one lawyer.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, that is a mistake. There are five, representing all kinds of experience, on this board.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. They have three lawyers, but they are not on this claims commission. There is one lawyer and one shipping operator and one shipping contractor, and the one appointed to that position was the man who has been most active before the Merchant Marine Committee in trying to father these claims, some of which were admitted to be not legal liabilities, and then an accountant, and others. It is admitted by the testimony. The gentleman insists that I do not know what is in the testimony, but right on the question of how it is to be determined I want to read as follows from page 907:

> Experience has now proved that this system can be improved, because whereas all claims up to now have been looked upon as purely legal questions, we have gained some experience and find that they also involve matters of fact that can be arrived at very readily by people who understand the shipbuilding industry. We are therefore instituting certain changes in the original system. It was a hard matter to get good shipbuilding men two or three years ago, because the shipyards were pretty full then, but now you can get all the shipbuilders you want. They are virtually walking the streets. Therefore we are reforming our department and have selected a claims representative under whom will function with a committee consisting of a practical shipbuilder, a member of our legal department (because many of these controversies are purely legal), and a representative of the comptroller's department. Thus we have selected from our organization the proper people to handle and adjudicate all phases of disputes that may arise. If they can settle a claim with the claimant, they will do so; subject, however, to the approval of the Shipping Board.
> If they can not settle with the claimant, then, if the claimant will agree to go before the United States Shipping Board claims commission and abide by its decision, that will be done; but there, again, the finding must come before the Shipping Board for final action.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does the gentleman not think it is pretty well safeguarded?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. My point is that they are doing the very thing that this Congress refused in a bill we kicked out last session to permit them to do, and that is to settle these claims except upon a legal liability. Everyone of these men ought to be paid every cent owing to him according to law or to contract, and no authority has been given them to settle upon any other basis. They are proposing to go along, as is indicated here, and disregard the legal liability and permit these men to help settle their own claims.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I wish now to call attention to some of the high-water marks in the Shipping Board business. There seems to be a confusion in respect to the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation. All of the things we hear so much about are practically foreign to the operation of the Shipping Board. It will be remembered that the Shipping Board was organized away back in 1915 or 1916. It is purely academic, as far as its duties are concerned, and advisory. When the war came on and we found ourselves without ships or shipping or anything of that character, the Emergency Fleet Corporation was organized within the Shipping Board, and the two things became confused, not only so far as the public mind is concerned but so far as the operation of the two activities were concerned, so much so that you could not tell which from t'other, and you could not arrive at any conclusion with reference to any transaction separating the Shipping Board from the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The result was that through the operation of the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation they expended prior to the 1st day of July last more than $3,000,000,000, and but few are aware, if any, on whom to place the responsibility for this enormous expenditure. When the present Shipping Board came in on the 1st day of July last they found it absolutely impossible to tell anything about the financial condition of the board. Shortly prior to that time we had before us the then director of the concern—they had had five directors, and the gentleman to whom I refer had not been in but a short time—and also the auditor who had been there for a considerable time. The director was testifying that they were making so many million dollars a month in the operation of their ships, and the auditor, on the other hand, said that they were losing practically the same number of millions of dollars per month that this man said they were making, showing the utter unreliability of the whole outfit.

There had been no inventory of the property. There was no way of ascertaining, so far as the books were concerned, where they were at. The records were not only incomplete but in many instances had been destroyed, either by accident or otherwise. And this is the condition in which the present administration found itself. When the officers appeared in July, immediately after they took charge, they could not present us any picture at all with reference to the financial conditions of the board, but promised us if we would give them six months they would lay their cards on the table and present to the American people the existing condition. They presented that picture within the time stipulated The head of every one of these divisions has drawn his own picture, and never has there been a more complete exposition made of conditions existing than that made by these men And I am glad to say that you can read them and you will find they are not made in partisanship nor in partisan spirit, but because of the desire of those charged with this responsibility to get at the facts, so that they can clear out this jumble of waste and confusion, and without regard to who may be responsible for its original creation.

A whole lot will be said before we get through with this discussion with reference to the great amount of money it is taking to run this enterprise. It is taking an enormous amount of money; but remember this is an enormous business, the like of which we never contended with before. And we have not anything to compare it with. And that is the trouble with us. We do not know much in this world except by comparison. The biggest building is the biggest building that we have ever seen until we have seen another larger, and the biggest ship that we ever rode on is the biggest ship in our conception until we ride on some bigger ship. So this life is comparison from the cradle to the grave. And where we are at a loss now is because we have not anything with which to compare the magnitude of the transactions involved. This business extends in its operations, past and now, from the Philippine Islands to the jungles of Africa.

Thirty-nine foreign countries have within them operations controlled, past and now, by this Shipping Board. Way down on the far coast of Africa, where coal mines exist everywhere and where free coal is protruding from the ground, they built oil-tank stations at a fabulous cost, and not only for the construction of oil tanks, but spent fabulous amounts for conveying around the world oil to put in those tanks, showing how absolutely unacquainted they were with the situation, and how, if you please, they were disregardful, even after advice and notice that oil could not be used and that coal would be used. Yet they built oil tanks to supply coal-burning steamers.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. My interest in this measure is based very largely on the fact that I am a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. We recognize the difficulties that the Shipping Board has had to deal with, I think. They have now idle about three-fourths of the ships the Government owns. The President in his recent message to the House intimated that at an early date he hoped to present to the Congress of the United States some proposed legislation that would help to solve this problem and the great loss to which we have been subjected by the operation of our ships. Can the gentleman tell us when the President will probably come to Congress with some remedial legislation to correct that situation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I can not.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will yield, I understand the Shipping Board intends to present to the President some methods, and the President intends to make his message somewhere around the 1st of February.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know how many of us have any comprehension of what the result of all this is to be. One of two things must result: Out of this and out of this chaos must emerge a merchant marine for the United States, or else we must surrender the flag of America on the seas.

Whether it is worth while to go through all this travail and whether it is worth while to continue longer this extraordinary expense in the hope of establishing a merchant marine, is for this Congress to determine. It is the purpose, as I understand, of this administration to advise some scheme whereby an American merchant marine may be built. Never was there such an opportunity presented to the world before for the building of a merchant marine as now.

You will remember that before we got into this war the flag of the United States had disappeared from the seas. Through the emergency of the war and because of our own necessities, we built ships, and more ships, good, bad, and indifferent, until to-day we have the nucleus out of which we may establish a merchant marine. We can not longer excuse ourselves for not establishing a merchant marine, because it is going to take too much money to build the ships. We have the ships, and we have got to provide in some way whereby these ships that we have will be taken over by the private interests of this country and the Government get out of it. The Government has no business in it. And the present administration, or those in charge of the Shipping Board and its ramifications, will hail with the greatest delight the day when they can hand the ships over to private enterprises, and when the flag of the United States at the head of a merchant marine, dominated by private interests, the only interests worth while in this connection, will be established.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Can the gentleman state what proportion of the ships are adapted to a merchant marine? What percentage of them?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We have about 1,400 ships that may be divided into three classes, A, B, and C. About one-fourth are first class; about one-fourth are between first and second class; and about one-half of the remaining are absolutely worthless.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would the gentleman include the wooden ships in the latter class?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are entirely in that class.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I agree with you about that.

Mr. EDMONDS. In the recent surveys it was found there were about five hundred of these ships that were ready and equal to anything going on the sea to-day.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Of the total cost of the ships we have now, what value is there to the ships that are really adapted to the merchant marine?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What do you mean?

Mr. FAIRFIELD. What I mean is this: The ships cost around $3,000,000, I understand.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is absolutely nothing to compare that with. We spent all the way from $170 and $200 up to $240 per gross ton for building them. The cost is now down to $35 per gross ton. There is no way of getting after that thing. I do not know of any possible way of going into it.

Here is the situation: We have about 11,000,000 marine tonnage; about 5,000,000 of that tonnage is composed of good ships. We have about 380 of these vessels that are plying on these trade routes to-day, most of them operating at a loss; but we have got to keep them up. We can not surrender them. The trouble with them—and that is one reason for our loss—is the fact that the trade routes established by the Shipping Board were entirely new. Now, if we are ever going to succeed in the establishing of a merchant marine, we have got not only to maintain but to increase the trade routes, so that the Shipping Board would be derelict in its duty unless it did, within the limits of prudence, keep these trade routes going, even if we are losing money. Now, every big transatlantic shipping concern is maintaining its trade routes at a loss, because they are hoping that when trade opens up they will get carrying enough to recoup their losses. If they abandon them they are in the same condition that we were in when the war broke out. We had no shipping business and we had no trade routes. So that it is essential that the operation of these various trade routes be continued until such time as we shall determine on a definite policy for the future. If we are not to establish an American merchant marine, that is one question. If we are going to establish an American merchant marine it is most essential that these trade routes be continued and maintained.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. The gentleman stated a moment ago that we had about 1,100,000 tons. The gentleman probably meant 11,000,000 tons?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what I meant.

Mr. BRIGGS. The Chairman of the Shipping Board made this statement on page 863:

> Of the 10,000,000 tons that we own, about 5,000,000 tons represents good commercial tonnage, comparable with any other tonnage in the world.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. That is what I meant.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman incorporate in the extension of his remarks the actual trade routes pursued by the Shipping Board at the present time, the different ones?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. You will find them very elaborately set forth in the hearings.

Mr. SNELL. Yes; but the average Member has not the time to go through all these things to get that information. If we can get it from the gentleman, it would be a great deal better. The gentleman spoke also about an inventory. Can the gentleman tell how much money is invested in the Shipping Board at the present time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, yes. We have got assets to-day, not including the fleet, not including the ships—we have got assets, according to the inventory, amounting to $306,000,000, against which there are current liabilities of about $69,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. That does not include ships?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

Mr. SNELL. What is the majority of those assets?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. A good many of those assets are pretty badly frozen, and they must be thawed out, if possible. Some are claims against the managing agents and some against transportation agents. But many of them are practically worthless.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman tell us the amount of money now tied up in ships?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, no; I can not. That must depend on appraisal.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman spoke of the actual inventory.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I think the hearings show the amount actually spent as being $2,600,000,000.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to know what is the idea of the Shipping Board of the actual value to the United States of those assets at this time.

Mr. DICKINSON. The total actual assets available amount to $306,000,000, exclusive of ships.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Here is the trouble about the valuation of those ships. The valuation put upon them might be worth something, and then again it might not be worth but little. We have about 280 of these wooden ships that some people say are absolutely worthless, upon which we are spending a great deal of money merely for their custody. They have taken and sold 12 of those ships for $2,000 each to be salvaged, with a side contract for 50 per cent above cost of salvaging, as an experiment. I will show you later how much it is costing even to take care of these old hulls.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Does the gentleman know whether or not any ship line in the United States to-day is making a profit?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I understand that there is not a freight line in the United States to-day that is paying a profit. Some of the North Atlantic passenger-carrying lines are making a profit.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it not a fact that has been established—and I am merely quoting Mr. Hurley of the Shipping Board—that under the present laws of the United States governing the conduct of seamen upon our ships, and so forth, known as the La Follette navigation law, it costs the United States——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to continue his speech as long as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Indiana be indefinitely extended. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. There is no agreement as to the division of time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There was an agreement as to the control but not as to the extent of the time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAYTON. Now I will renew my question, if the gentleman please. Is it not a fact that the present condition of the navigation laws of the United States is such that it costs for the United States for a 5,000-ton vessel to make a certain voyage $3,000, and that it costs an English ship to make the same voyage only $1,500, and for the same voyage and tonnage it costs the Jap ship only about $950?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman's figures are substantially correct.

Mr. LAYTON. They are practically correct?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. The point I wanted to get at was this: The gentleman was speaking about the establishment of an American merchant marine. Had we not better look this question of the establishment of an American merchant marine in the eye, and consider this, that we shall never have an American merchant marine except under one or other of these two distinct bases: One is that we grant a subsidy or donate money to the shipping lines, so as to make the cost of operation comparable with that of our rivals, or else have the Government take its hands off the shipping business entirely and let the shipping companies take their course and operate their vessels as they see fit.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We will never have a merchant marine in this country unless we do the things that other countries have done in order to have a merchant marine. There is not a merchant marine that exists on the face of the earth to-day except through a subsidy or through preferentials.

Mr. McKENZIE. What countries in the world pay subsidies to their freighters?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. England has a system of preferentials that amounts to a great deal more than any subsidy; but I can not enter into that now. This is aside from this matter. England has a system of preferentials that beats any system of subsidies now in vogue.

Now, I hope I may be permitted to go on for a few minutes without interruption, so that I may continue my statement. I spoke a while ago about the scope of the activities of the Shipping Board. Its scope is as wide as the commerce of the world. These people contracted for ships. They took over ships. They took over shipyards and built new shipyards. They became shipbuilders. They were bankers. They were financiers, furnishing the money to all characters of combinations that desired to go into the shipbuilding business. They were general contractors. They were wholesale dealers in lumber. They were merchants. They were the owners of every character and conceivable kind of business. They owned forests that were measured by the thousands of acres. They were insurance companies, doing all character of maritime insurance business. They built and operated street railways, interurban railways, and other railroads. They built hotels. The largest hotel that was ever built by the hand of man was built by the Shipping Board. They owned entire towns, fitted up in a permanent way, with paved streets and all the appurtenances of a modern municipality.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. What was the hotel that the gentleman referred to as the largest ever built by the hand of man?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It was just outside of Philadelphia. It would accommodate more people than any other hotel that was ever built in the world. They built entire towns for the housing of their workmen. They built thousands of miles of paving, and water mains, gas mains, and sewer mains. They built moving-picture houses, hospitals, and all the necessaries of municipal life. They constructed and operated fuel-oil stations all over the world. They organized shipping agencies all over the world. They had recruiting stations all over the world. They built warehouses to take care of goods and supplies all over the world. They controlled the dry docks and the shipyards of the entire country.

The coming of the armistice found us in the possession of all this immense amount of property—ships, docks, shipyards, mines, forests, buildings, hotels, street railway lines, machinery of every character and description. This property was scattered all over the world, and the accounts and records of the corporation were so decentralized that it was utterly impossible to form any conclusion as to the financial situation. I want to give you one concrete example: A gentleman who felt that he owed the Shipping Board $200,000 and who wanted to get the thing behind him came down here to make settlement with them. They had to resort to more than 210 sources to search and find out the condition of the account existing between this man and the Shipping Board. As a result of the investigation that they made they determined that instead of the man owing them $200,000 they owed him $800,000. That is but one example out of thousands, showing you how utterly impossible it was to get any information that was worth while. There was a discrepancy of $47,000,000 between the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the accounts of the managing agencies.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Suppose we should refuse this appropriation. Would not they have to go to the Court of Claims, where they could propound their claims and the Government could produce its testimony? And does not the gentleman think that would be the better way to handle them?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it would be the worst way in the world.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I would like to have the gentleman tell us why.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have tried for an hour to tell you why, and if I have not succeeded in doing it I can not do it now.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I will yield to the gentleman further time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I must use the balance of my time in explaining other features of this measure. Right here I want to call your attention to this managing-agent business. They seemed to make a specialty of selecting freaks for managing agents.

They took hair dressers out of hair-dressing parlors and made them managing agents for this great Emergency Fleet enterprise, and managing agents to buy cargoes to lade their ships with all the necessities for a crew. In some cases before they would land they would dump everything into the sea, so that they might buy another outfit at the place where they landed. This thing kept going on and on, so that out of this $3,000,000,000 wrung from the pockets of the taxpayers of this country it will never be possible to determine how much was legitimately spent and how much of it was utter waste.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am sorry to interrupt the gentleman, but I am obliged to leave the Hall for the purpose of attending a committee hearing. I want, if possible, to get at somewhere near the amount that is appropriated by this bill for the Shipping Board. The bill does not state. How much does the gentleman think it gives?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I can tell the gentleman exactly how much is appropriated in this bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will listen to me I will tell him. There is $50,000,000 appropriated for the settlement of claims. There is $50,000,000 appropriated for operating expenses. There is asked an extension of the $55,000,000 that was granted in the last appropriation bill from collections that may be made. That is to extend over the fiscal year 1923. So that the appropriations carried by this bill amount to $100,000,000 with an authorization for the use of whatever may remain of that $55,000,000 after the close of this fiscal year and existing during the next fiscal year.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, well, the gentleman knows that there are appropriations in this bill that are absolutely indefinite. You appropriate what is on hand July 1, 1922—how much would that amount to?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I can not tell.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is one of the amounts segregated, the amount on hand July 1, 1922.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What that may be no man on this earth can tell.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But a moment ago the gentleman said he could tell.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I can tell when the 1st of July comes, but I can not anticipate the future, and the gentleman from Iowa can not either.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; but what I wanted to get at was how much the gentleman thought was going to be expended.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say that it was stated that on the 1st of next July there would probably be a deficit of $11,000,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is the purpose of appropriating the $50,000,000—to cover the deficit. We are putting $50,000,000 into a business, expecting that there is going to be a loss. Now, if there is no loss we will not spend the entire $50,000,000, but anticipating it, basing it on the months that have just transpired, it will amount to about $50,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What the gentleman from Iowa refers to is the amount that may be received from operations during the next fiscal year, and then the amount on hand, whatever it may be.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; those amounts that are utterly indefinite, and I am opposed to indefinite appropriations.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And so am I, but here we are; we have got to appropriate money for what would otherwise be a private establishment. It remains a private establishment engaged in active enterprise where they get money and pay out money and where they earn money and lose money. It would be impossible as a practical proposition for these men to take every dollar that they collect for the sale of a ticket or for carrying 50 tons of freight and turn it over to the Treasury of the United States. So it is impossible to keep that kind of a tab on these people as we do in other activities. I think we ought to get rid of it as quickly as we can.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. As to that part, I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The property was found in 750 different places, scattered to the four points of the earth. At Hog Island there were 125,000 different characters of property, comprising millions of units, and an inventory consisted of 11,000 typewritten sheets. Engaged in it were 300 Emergency Fleet employees and 2,500 checkers and typewriters, and they got the figures out in two months with 400,000 extensions. Now I call attention to the pay roll to show what the Shipping Board is trying to do. It is the most unenviable position that any man can have. It was as rotten as it could be when the present administration took hold of it, and it was worth any man's reputation to touch it. The number of employees on June 15, 1921, was 8,324. On December 31, 1921, six months after, it was 5,035, a reduction of more than 3,000 and a saving of $4,942,319 annually. In the comptroller's office, 1921, there were 3,086 people with an annual salary of $5,787,033. On December 31, 1921, the number had been reduced to 1,535, an annual roll of $3,832,000, or a reduction of $2,648,231.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. The gentleman says that the Shipping Board administration was rotten. I knew it was; but over here several of us would like to know in what respect it was rotten. Where was the rottenness? Does the gentleman intend to go more into the details in that assertion?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I would not have time to enter upon that, and I would not know where to stop if I did. If you gentlemen will read the hearings you can get a little bit of an idea as to where some of this money went and how it was wasted. I am not here for the purpose of criminating anybody connected with this thing. I believe that the greater portion of this was absolutely due to the disorganized condition of the whole thing and the improper managing of it. It was an emergency organization created during the war and was of colossal magnitude, extending all over the earth and into every hamlet.

Mr. LANGLEY. I agree with the gentleman's statement, but I was seeking to give the gentleman an opportunity to go more into the details if he wishes to do so.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Life is too short to go into that.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. It seems to me that the gentleman is giving the information that ought to answer the question of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; about one-half of 1 per cent of it.

Mr. KOPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KOPP. How much has the United States put into the Shipping Board; how much have they sunk?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. About three and one-half billion dollars.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. The gentleman says three and a half billion dollars have been sunk. The gentleman does not mean that the whole three and a half billion dollars has been sunk?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I mean the United States has put in three and a quarter billion dollars. We have got whatever there is left.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. We have the ships, and 350 merchant vessels——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and our experience. [Laughter.]

Mr. FAIRFIELD. It is a fair presumption that the ships are worth about $250,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would be just a guess with me. I do not want to make a guess on so important a matter.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Indiana will permit, of course the gentleman understands that we have a great many different types of ships, and that they have all a different value on the market. If you take the market price to-day of an ordinary cargo ship, second rate, it is probably worth from $25 to $35 a ton. A good ship is worth from $40 to $50 a ton. Those are cargo ships. The value of a passenger ship depends entirely upon the equipment, on the kind of ship it is, the speed of the ship. Some of those ships that we have built at a cost of probably $7,000,000 are worth $2,000,000 to-day. It would be, therefore, impossible for any man to make an accounting of these ships and say what their value is. They are valuable to the man who wants them and not to the man who does not want them. I should say that the value of the ships to-day is easily in the neighborhood of from $350,000,000 to $500,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] if it is not a fact that there is no sale for ships at this time, that there is no way of fixing any value, and that the values given are simply estimates?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely.

Mr. EDMONDS. The only thing that we have to base the value of a ship on to-day is the proceeds from sales. To-day the market is a little bit stronger than it was three months ago.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Practically none are being sold.

Mr. EDMONDS. None are being sold. I would like to say to the gentleman, so that he will understand, that the trouble here is that we have about 60,000,000 tons of ships in the world and have business for only about 35,000,000 tons. That statement is made in accordance with Lloyd's Annual Almanac, and I presume is based upon the word of British experts. As long as you have that excess tonnage, or until the business of the world can build up to the number of ships on hand, ships are not going to be very profitable property.

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman will permit, my information is that you can not give those ships away that they have down there in the James River. I went on an inspection tour with Assistant Secretary Clifford. They have about 800 ships there, and about three-fourths of them are steel and the balance wood. They are rusting and rotting there in the water and the Government could not give them away.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They have sold 12 of those ships as an experiment, and are having them salvaged for the purpose of ascertaining what they can get out of them. In July, 1921, there were 275 of those wooden ships tied up. There were 186 employees on board to take care of them at an annual cost, with incidental expenses, amounting to $226,656. There are now 264 of those wooden vessels with a personnel reduced from 186 to 33, at a total annual expense reduced to $53,113, showing a reduction of more than 73 per cent, or $175,000 per annum. In July, 1921, there were 711 of these steel vessels laid up, with 4,557 employees on them, with an annual cost per vessel of $12,233. Now there are 1,029 vessels laid up, about 300 more, with total employees reduced to 3,421, an annual reduction amounting to approximately seven and one-half million dollars.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. The gentleman will remember that the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Good, former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, suggested that if the Government needed a breakwater it might be well to fill those ships with stone and sink them, and the gentleman stated that 10 ships have been sold as an experiment. Can he state what they brought?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are just going through the experimentation now. They are being broken up and salvaged.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Two thousand dollars as a basic price.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and they are to get one-half of the net over and above that amount.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. In view of the fact that those ships never have been used, were never fit for use, and there is no probability of their being used, would the gentleman state whether it would not be the policy of economy to sell them at $2,000 each, if possible, rather than to maintain them at great expense?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; I think it would, personally; but people differ about that, and some think there is some way of working some money out of them after shipping looks up. This is no time to try to sell ships of any character. There is no demand for them. Some of these ships are useful for a certain kind of carrying trade, if the opportunity arises for their use.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is it not a fact that Mr. Lasker now takes the position that those ships ought not to be sold, but ought to be kept there in the James River?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He thinks they ought to be kept there until the experiment is determined. They once had them sold for $2,000 apiece, but they found that they were not within the provisions of the law and they had to cancel the contract.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does he not go further than that? Does he not say that if these ships were sold they would likely be put into operation over on the Volga and the Danube Rivers and on other rivers in Europe and interfere with the sale of some of these steel ships that he wants to sell?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is another thing they have to consider. They have to be mindful in selling this great amount of supplies that they do not by reason of the reduction in the price of the matter destroy not only their own best interests but also some of the interests of the people in like business. It is a wonderfully complex proposition, and there is not anything that it does not reach.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to say in answer to the gentleman from Kansas that the engineering department looked into the matter to see whether the ships could be used as breakwaters. They investigated the matter thoroughly and decided that it was not a practical thing.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Now, I wish to say in passing that when the present administration took charge of the affairs of this concern they found they were practically without any legal department. Nobody knew of the number of claims that were then existing or the amount of them. So one of the first things that was essential was to organize a legal department and take care of the legal transactions so incumbent upon this business. They appreciated the fact that there were hundreds of millions of dollars of claims filed and to be filed against them, some of them good, some of them absolutely worthless. They faced a great many of these suits that had already been started in the courts of this country, many in the admiralty courts, in which defaults had been taken against them and judgments had already been entered against them. And much of the time of this new organization was taken in presenting reasons why these defaults should be set aside, especially those saving the Government millions of dollars taken by default and judgments entered against it.

In addition, the law department received, as an inheritance from the past, a legacy of some 3,500 cases and claims against the Shipping Board, involving some $300,000,000, which must be defended or settled.

To-day, with a wholly inadequate staff, the law department of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation is functioning on a systematic basis. It has been divided into four main divisions: First, the admiralty division; second, contracts, opinions, recoveries, and special assignments division; third, claims commission; fourth, litigation division.

The first-named group in New York should be increased by at least six trial lawyers and a chief admiralty counsel. At present 359 of the pending cases have been assigned to nine lawyers. There are, all told, approximately 1,000 cases in admiralty pending against the board in the New York district alone, involving claims of some $30,000,000.

In a general way the entire burden of conducting the vast current legal business of the Emergency Fleet Corporation falls upon the second division. As the board owns merchandise having value of $35,000,000, and plants worth $46,000,000 and some 1,400 steel vessels, and has been conducting an aggressive campaign to sell and dispose of this property as rapidly as possible, it is quite obvious that the attorneys in this division of the law department have a constant task of large proportions, exclusive of their other duties.

This division is keeping reasonably up to date with current work, and the board feels that in this section it has as efficient a law department as any law firm in the country.

The termination of hostilities by the armistice resulted eventually in a curtailment of the tremendous shipbuilding program then under way. Contracts involving the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars were canceled in whole or in part. This termination resulted in a great number of claims against the Shipping Board by shipbuilders and vendors of materials under such contracts. Their settlement has been assigned to the third division.

On July 1, 1921, there were approximately 1,000 claims left unsettled for a gross sum of approximately $135,000,000. On January 1 the legal division had entirely finished work on 270 cases, with 200 additional cases practically ready for final adjustment. These 270 cases, 81 of which were disposed of administratively and 189 of which have been presented to the commission, involve claims by the contractors of $8,178,643.72, and the settlements made and awards recommended in these cases actually amount to $2,270,652.89. The 200 additional cases can probably be settled for about $268,000.

In the litigation division there are 224 cases, exclusive of admiralty cases, pending against the Fleet Corporation in the United States courts and the State courts involving claims aggregating $104,628,455.30. The United States district attorneys in the various States generally are in charge of these litigation cases of the Shipping Board, but general supervision of this litigation by Shipping Board counsel at Washington is not only of the greatest value to the district attorneys but it is a necessity.

Thus each division of the Shipping Board's law department is functioning on a systematic basis, despite the handicap of an inadequate staff, and the confused conditions which were in evidence on July 1, 1921, have been practically removed.

Now, at this juncture I wish to say that it has been discovered that through the inadequacy of the legal department under the old régime the country has been mulcted out of millions and millions of dollars by reason of the faulty contracts that were drawn in the legal department. Not that these men were dishonest; not that they had any design of defrauding the Government, but by reason of their coming in contact with the shrewd men who were making the contracts for the other side; they were overreached, and we are now suffering the consequence.

Much will be said during the course of this debate with reference to the amount of money that is being expended in this legal department. Again, I appeal to you to try to get your minds fixed upon the magnitude of this business. Try to bring it home to yourselves as nearly as you can, and imagine that you have got over $300,000,000 of lawsuits filed against you, all the way from Hawaii to the Philippine Islands, in the courts of admiralty, in the civil courts, in the United States courts, and that you are constantly being confronted with the biggest lawyers in the United States, whose salaries alone aggregate many hundreds of thousands of dollars a year.

If you were in such a condition, I dare say that you would want, in order that you might have the conscious feeling that your interests would be protected, to at least have some good lawyers, some men that have established a reputation, some men that have come in contact with the courts of this country where these cases are being tried. There must be a balance in all these things.

I appreciate the fact that back in my State and in your State, in some of the little towns and cities, there are probably men more erudite in the general practice of law than these practitioners in these large cities, who, by reason of their success in their practice, have amassed fortunes, and are receiving hundreds of thousands of dollars each year. But the Shipping Board can not go out and get these men in the country places and train them for this particular business. They must get those, as nearly as they can, who are in close proximity and in contact with the courts where these trials are to be had and where these cases arise, and can measure steel with the opponents on the other side; if in New York, with the men who have gained world-wide fame and success before the courts of admiralty and other courts there; likewise in St. Louis and Chicago and other places.

Much criticism was had at the time we had the deficiency bill up here because we were paying these men, some of them, as high as $15,000 a year. A limitation was put upon the amount that we might pay them, so that some of them could receive not more than $11,000 a year. The consequence has been that some of these men who came here have resigned their places and gone home. This legal department is in a most precarious position at this particular time, because of the magnitude of the claims that are pending against the Shipping Board, and because of the necessity of their immediate determination, not only to the litigants, but to the taxpayers of the United States.

Even though we may think, and even though we are justified in thinking, that many of these men are receiving more money than they could earn back in their local practice, this you should take into consideration—that their employment at best is only temporary. We have the word and assurance of Mr. Schlesinger, head of the legal department, in whom I have the greatest confidence because of the patriotic zeal and energy he is devoting to this work and who I know is making sacrifices to come here and is receiving only one-tenth of the amount he could receive in the concern with which he is connected, that if we have faith to continue this organization as he has it and give this amount of $50,000,000 for the settlement of these claims, by the 1st of January next he will reduce by more than one-half the expenditures of the legal department. I do not know a better investment. And I want to ask you do you want to take the responsibility of having it said that we have lost to the United States Government, by reason of lawsuits going against her, millions of dollars that might not have gone against her had her case and her facts been properly presented? I do not want to take the responsibility; you do not want to do it. I would rather err on the other side and say that, temporarily at least, we will appropriate more money than we feel these gentlemen, perhaps, could earn back in their private pursuits.

Now, gentlemen, I have taken more time than I should have taken in discussing this Shipping Board, but it strikes me that that is one of the most important matters that we have immediately to do with, and that the people of this country are making more inquiries about, and concerning which there is more misinformation than concerning any other activity which the Congress has to deal with, is this Shipping Board proposition. I hope, therefore, that gentlemen will avail themselves of the efforts that we have made to have these men give us the fullest possible explanation of the manner in which they have been conducting the business. Never in my experience, and I do not think in yours, has there been more complete detail of the operation of any business, large or small, than is presented by the hearings on the Shipping Board, and I invite your closest scrutiny to those hearings.

Now, there are a few other high points in this bill that I think you are interested in. Much has been said about the Housing Corporation and about the continuance of the Government hotels. There is a campaign going on here now, founded upon a false pretense, in my opinion, trying to dispose of and do away with the Government hotels down here in front of the Union Station. These Government hotels are a part of the Housing Corporation that was created, as you remember, during the existence of the war and for the purpose of taking care of the army of clerks made necessary by reason of the expansion of these various departments. There are 1,800 girls down there now. Some people would have these houses razed in order that we might add to the beautification of the city of Washington, and let these girls go where they may and seek as best they can to find a place to rest their heads.

We know what happened to them before these houses were built. We know that they were subjected not only to inconvenience, but absolutely, if you please, they were subjected to such conditions and treatment that none of us could approve, and in consequence these houses were built. There is a necessity for them now, for the profiteering is still wild in the city of Washington, and what would happen to these girls I do not know, if they had to go and seek shelter, if these houses were torn down. We do know that before these houses were built they had seven or eight in a room, charging each one of them $15 or $20 a month—rooms which the renters would have been glad to have rented by the month to a single person at that rate before this emergency arose.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am chairman of the committee that has jurisdiction to some extent of that question, and I do not want to discuss it very much just now, but is it not a fact that the conditions now are somewhat different from what they were at the time the gentleman refers to, and are there not opportunities now of securing rooms elsewhere much better than there were then and at a less price?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It seems not. If you try to find an apartment, you are held up just as you were in 1920, and the same is true in the case of a private room. Until such time as the good people of the city of Washington feel that they can provide for the accommodation of these girls, where they can be at least decently treated at a moderate recompense, I am not going to vote for tearing down these buildings, even though they do mar the landscape.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The Government is not losing any money on them, is it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. On the contrary, it is making some money from them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Are we to understand that these buildings are to remain permanently?

Mr. LANGLEY. They were not built as permanent buildings.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, no. I do not think, though, that the time has come when the Congress of the United States is justified in tearing them down, and I think we would be derelict to the people who come here from all over the United States, from our districts, if we were to let those people become the prey of the profiteers of Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LAZARO. The gentleman made the statement that there are 1,800 girls in those buildings and many thousands outside. Under the gentleman's statement are we not justified in extending the Ball bill?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. We are justified in continuing it, and we shall make a great mistake if we do not continue it. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. My concern is whether we are not going into the housing business here in Washington under Government expense and control. If we are holding these buildings because we can not find space for our employees, is not that the first step in entering upon this as a permanent policy?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think not. I would be opposed to entering upon it as a permanent policy. It was originally an emergency proposition. The emergency has not yet subsided. I do not know when it will subside; possibly not until Congress takes drastic action to convince these people in Washington of the duty they owe to the public in making proper provision for the care of these girls.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not desire to put myself in the attitude of favoring the razing of these buildings, but I do want to bring out this point: That there are thousands and thousands of Government employees who are paying much more for their rooms and board than are these employees, and they are less conveniently located. Why should the Government favor one class of its employees is the point I want to make.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; that is true.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is evidenced by the fact that there is a waiting list at the Government hotel all the time. But suppose we take these buildings down. What is to become of these 1,800 people? Not only would those rooming now in other places suffer more intensely, but it would add to the suffering of each one of these 1,800.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. The Government dormitories, operated for the benefit of these girls, are operated at a loss or at a profit?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Without taking into consideration the original investment, so far as the operation alone is concerned, it is being operated at a profit, as I understand.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. That is all we need concern ourselves with now.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Do you know what they charge the inmates for their rooms and breakfast and dinners? I believe they get their luncheon down town.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. About $40 or $45 per month.

Mr. CROWTHER. Is it not just as legitimate an expense as for us to charge for our keep downstairs in the restaurant?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, I will let the gentleman answer that question for himself. I want to call your attention to the fact that not only is this Government hotel being conducted in a way that I am informed is satisfactory to those who are patronizing it, but it is reducing expenses. They have voluntarily reduced their clerical wage some $5,000, and we encouraged them by reducing $5,000 ourselves. We did not propose that they should be any more economical than we are, and that reduction has been made. Likewise there is a reduction as far as the operation of the real Housing Corporation is concerned. We still own all over this country a lot of houses. Some of them are in process of disposition. Some of them have been sold and mortgages taken. As to some of them the buyers have failed to keep up their payments and suits are pending for mortgage foreclosures. As to some of them we are having trouble so far as the payment of taxes is concerned. As long as the title remains in the United States of course there is no obligation against the Government for the payment of taxes to the various municipalities in which these properties are located, but after sales are made and mortgages taken that question arises, and we have had some trouble about that, but I am happy to state that they are winding up those cases in a very satisfactory way.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman please state for the benefit of the committee what reduction has been made in the salary list of the Housing Corporation here in Washington as compared with the current law?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is a lump-sum appropriation and there was a horizontal reduction made in the salaries of all the mechanics and employees of the Housing Corporation of $200 per person.

Mr. EVANS. Per annum?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. Now, I want to call attention next to the Interstate Commerce Commission. For salaries and general expenses we recommend $2,150,000. This is a reduction of $50,000 as compared with 1922 and a reduction of $80,000 below the estimates submitted by the Budget. To the Valuation Division, which has been engaged in the valuation of railroad properties, we appropriate $1,300,000, which is $450,000 less than the appropriation for 1922, and $200,000 less than the approriation recommended by the Budget.

I wish to say with reference to this proposition that this valuation business that has been extended and reextended for the last seven or eight years, now bids fair to come to a close at some time in the near future. As far as field work is concerned it has been terminated. All of the activity of this division is now concentrated in the city of Washington, and we are told that so far as the general valuation is concerned it will be practically completed within a year.

Under the law as it is now constituted there will be a continuation of a certain portion of this work to keep current the valuation of the various railroads throughout the future, but it strikes us that by reason of the reduction in the cost of living expenses these gentlemen can make a substantial reduction out of their lump-sum appropriation, at least to the amount of $200,000 in the salary list of the employees they have.

We have the same idea with reference to the employees of the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. In order that we might have some understanding about that thing we called into consultation those at the head of the personnel and some of the commissioners of the Interstate Commerce Commission. This is what is now happening in the Interstate Commerce Commission, and as I understand will happen in some of the other divisions of the Government where the entire salary list is paid from a lump-sum appropriation. You will recall that during the debate upon the reclassification bill it was stated that the President has issued an executive order asking for an efficiency survey in the various bureaus and divisions of this Government. The Interstate Commerce Commission has adopted and is now putting into force and effect that Executive order whereby the salaries in that commission will be made up according to that efficiency survey as given by the Bureau of Efficiency. This will result in a saving to the United States Government. The exact amount is problematical, but we felt that they could be reduced at least $50,000, and the Valuation Division $200,000.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Can the gentleman inform the committee anything about what the probable expense will be of running the valuation work after the initial work has been completed?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I can not. It ought to be only nominal as compared with the great work that has been in progress. They say that when the valuation is completed it will not be difficult, and will not require a great outlay to keep up the valuations from year to year and keep them current, so that I think the expense will be practically negligible.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So that the force will be very materially reduced?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; in fact we ought to get rid of practically all of them next year.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the Civil Service Commission. More especially am I interested in calling attention to the figures presented by that commission showing the number of employees that we have in the United States Government to-day. The total number in the District of Columbia on the 30th of November, 1921, the last date to which the figures were brought up, was 75,974, as against 39,481 in 1916. The table which I hold in my hand discloses how these employees are distributed among the various bureaus. It also shows the increase and the decrease. It will be interesting to you, I know, not only to be thus informed as to what seems to be the growth of the institutions that were in existence at the time we got into the war, but also the additions that came by reason of new activities, that are now continued, and in all probability will be continued in some number at least throughout all future time.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does this number include only the employees in the District of Columbia, or does it include the field force?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The 75,974 includes only the District of Columbia.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. When we had the reclassification bill under consideration it was stated that we had 69,000 employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that. We reduced them down to about that number, but a lot of them have been put back. This statement which I have comes directly from the Civil Service Commission, and I take it for granted that it is correct, and it shows that on the 30th day of November we had in the District of Columbia 75,974 employees. I have prepared these figures, showing you, in addition to the statement disclosed by the report of the Civil Service Commission, the number that came as a result of new activities growing out of the war.

Mr. LANGLEY. Before the gentleman proceeds to another subject, may I interrupt him? On page 5, lines 6, 7, and 8, I notice this language:

Provided, That the secretary of the Civil Service Commission shall be deemed an employee for the purposes of this act.

What does that mean?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The purpose of that is this: It was in the act of last year. That old gentleman down there by the name of Doyle—I venture to say that you have all run across him—has been connected with the Civil Service Commission ever since its creation. He told me that during the time that Theodore Roosevelt was a member of the commission they had to move out of one building into another, and they hauled all their effects in a hand cart. So he dates back from the beginning of things. This was put in for the reason that the Comptroller General held that he was not entitled to the bonus.

Mr. LANGLEY. On page 7 there is a provision for the examination of presidential postmasters, and so forth, $75,000. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows whether the future general manager of the movies agreed to that amount, or did he want a larger sum?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The future general manager of the movies did not have anything to do with it. Now, here is the point I was making. Here is the situation that presented itself to the Civil Service Commission. That commission, if it is to remain what the framers thought it should be, ought to have some of the best men in the country connected with it. Here is what is going on down there to-day: Pretty nearly all the civil-service list now has to pass the examination of the Civil Service Commission, technical men employed in all the technical branches of the Government, some receiving $5,000 and $6,000 a year. Whether they are qualified to pass is being determined by $1,200 clerks connected with the commission.

That is one reason why we propose that there shall be a rearrangement pending the reclassification when there may be some provision so that these employees will be given a compensation commensurate with the responsibility of their work. So, also, may this be said as to the examining into the qualifications of postmasters, about which so much has been said and will be said. That is a new duty thrown on the Civil Service Commission, and they tell me it has taken one-third of their time, and no wonder there is confusion and no wonder there is cause for dissatisfaction, because men without practical experience, a clerk at $1,200 is passing on the qualifications of men who occupy the position of postmaster where the salary ranges from $5,000 to $8,000.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks this additional duty should have been put on the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is academic. If I had my way, there are a lot of things connected with the Government that never would have been started.

Mr. LANGLEY. And according to my idea that is one of them.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. Does not the gentleman think that the appropriation of $75,000 for the examination of presidential postmasters might well be omitted?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, if the gentleman wants to try to get that through Congress he has the right to do it.

Mr. ROSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. ROSE. Can the gentleman account for the long delay experienced by all of us in getting reports on examinations made by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, I have had enough to do with my own business without sticking my nose into anybody else's, and so I do not know. [Laughter.] Now, I was calling attention to the clerical force that came here by virtue of the war, an entirely new force, which still remains. There are 1,039 employees of the Shipping Board and in the Railroad Administration 1,130. Special Hygiene, 16, and Tariff Commission, 91. Employees of the Compensation Commission, 76; the Federal Board for Vocational Education, 82; the Veterans' Bureau, 5,916, so that we have to-day in the Government 9,417 civil-service employees that were not in existence, or the activities that call for them now was not in existence, prior to the beginning of the war. Deduct that from the 75,974 and you will have 66,557 in the old departments that were in existence before the war. Subtracting from that 39,481 that we had at the time we entered the war, and it shows the increase in the departments on account of the operation of the war to be 27,076.

Now, I doubt if you are ever going to be able to get back to that number that we had before the war. In my opinion we never will go back. In the first place, there is the natural increase, the natural growth. There would have been a greater number now if we had never had a war, because of the natural growth. The history of the country shows that the inflation of service attendant upon every war and in the aftermath of the war has been more pronounced in the civil-service employees than in any other, so that the greatest effort we can make at reduction will be by reason of the closest scrutiny by Congress and through the administration of the Budget. That instrumentality has been responsible for a great reduction in this bill now pending before you and of the bills already considered and in those that are to follow. The country will never know or appreciate the full value of the services that are rendered unless they study the results as reflected in the appropriation bills.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. I understood the gentleman to state a moment ago that while a number of employees have been dropped, a number have been reemployed or restored. Will the gentleman tell us to what extent that has occurred and how that arrangement has been brought about?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Congress is responsible for it. Every time somebody comes in here and asks us for an increase in the appropriation for the Internal Revenue Department to further enforce the narcotic act or the prohibition act we fall over ourselves in making the appropriation. It has all been done for the purpose of hiring more men. The gentleman who has propounded the question voted for every one of these appropriations, and yet he stands here and criticizes because these things are being done. A general accounting officer told me within less than two months after he took his office he discharged, because of the fact that he thought he could get rid of them, some eighty-odd men employed in the various auditors' offices and that all but 10 per cent of them were reemployed immediately in other branches of the Treasury Department. It might be interesting to note that on the outside of the District of Columbia before we got into the war we had 397,722 employees, while on the 30th day of November last we had 518,267. Of this increase, 9,964 was by reason of agencies that did not exist before the war, and the net increase of 120,881 is in consequence of the increase that came during the war and that we have never been able to reduce below this number down to this time.

I wish now to call attention to another item or two. I invite attention particularly at this moment to a little appropriation, insignificant when compared with the other appropriations in this bill, but when we measure the administration of the appropriation it is found to be of some consequence, at least. I refer to the appropriation for the Fine Arts Commission. In 1910 the Fine Arts Commission was created, and its duties were set forth in the law which created it. The law provides that the President shall have authority to fill all vacancies, and so forth, and then—

It shall be the duty of such commission to advise upon the location of the statues, fountains, and monuments in the public squares, streets, and parks in the District of Columbia, and upon the selection of models for statues, fountains, and monuments erected under the authority of the United States, and upon the selection of artists for the execution of the same.

Out of that little nucleus those in this apparently insignificant little association, or activity, or whatever it may be called, whose purpose was to add to the adornment and the beautification of the city of Washington, through Executive order and the assumption of authority, has so extended its authority that they are to-day monarchs of all they survey. When I say "they" I refer more particularly to one man, who really is the Fine Arts Commission, who is not only dominating but domineering not only the business of this commission but sticking his nose into everybody's business, until he has become a common, ordinary pest. I invite the attention of the committee to the hearings in this case in support of the assertion that I have made. There is absolutely nothing personal in this, so far as I am concerned, but it strikes me that when a man occupying the position that this man occupies abuses it as he has abused this the public should be informed with reference to his conduct.

The statute to which I have referred provides that there shall be no compensation paid these men, and only their expenses paid when attending meetings in the city of Washington. This particular gentleman would be entitled to no remuneration whatever, even expense money, because the United States Government is to-day paying him $3,000 a year for his full time as a member of the force in the Library of Congress, in the Division of Manuscripts. Yet he spends more than one-third of his time away from the duties for which the Government is paying him for full time, and the record discloses that fact. I have here a photostatic copy of the vouchers that he has submitted in proof of that fact. That is not the worst of it. These meetings that are required to be held in the city of Washington, for which compensation might be paid other members of the commission who come from outside, are not held in Washington, except occasionally. The records disclose that they are held either in New York or in some place else where they desire to journey. Every time he signed his name to one of these vouchers and has taken any portion of this expense money he has violated the law. He claims to be a resident of the city of Detroit, Mich. He has been here for years and years. He was a former secretary of a Senator from Michigan. According to his own disclosure he happened to be in the city of Detroit when he was appointed to the position that he holds in the Library. He took that position the next day after he got here, and yet he charged the trip from Detroit to Washington to the expense of the Fine Arts Commission.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman mention the name of this Fine Arts Commission man?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. His name is Charles Moore.

Mr. MANN. What was the last statement the gentleman made with reference to expense?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The last statement I made, and I reiterate it, because the facts warrant it, is this: When he came here to take his position as a member of the staff in the Library of Congress, he charged his expense money in coming from Detroit down here to the Fine Arts Commission.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. On another occasion he happened to be in Detroit, according to his statement, when he had notice there was going to be a meeting of the Fine Arts Commission in New York. He charged up to this Fine Arts expense fund his travel all the way from Detroit to New York and then back here again to Washington, which is a violation of the law. That is not the worst of it. One of the things that attracted our attention to this is that they sought to have this law so amended that there would not be any curb upon the amount of expense they might incur for their personal accommodation. There is not a single voucher in all this photostatic display where he did not violate the law with reference to the per diem expense account, or the amount allowed under the law. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. I noticed in reading the hearings that there was some question as to the date when Mr. Moore's appointment as chief of the division in the Library took effect. Did the gentleman inquire when that was?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think it was on the 17th of August; I forget the exact date.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How did all of those vouchers get by the comptroller?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will tell you how. I examined these, and there is not a single item that sets forth anything on a voucher except traveling expenses on official business. By some hook or crook, I do not know, they have had the waivers attached to each one of these items, so that they do not have to be certified.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not that show negligence on the part of the comptroller's office?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely. But I do not think they could get by the present accounting officer.

Mr. MICHENER. You have stated these things about this man, and if they are true something should be done. Now, what would you advise other than bringing the matter to the attention of Congress for the mere purpose of talking?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am calling to the attention of Congress that that man should not be permitted to stay where he is for 24 hours.

Mr. ROACH. Why has he not been removed?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know. Perhaps it is true that this is the first time this malfeasance has been brought to the attention of the public, for it is inconceivable to my mind that this thing has been going on all these years. Except for the fact that these vouchers have the waivers attached, they would not have certified them. They went on the assumption that it was such a high connected affair that the gentleman would not do anything that was dishonorable, probably.

Mr. KING. Was not this the same Charles Moore that was secretary of the District of Columbia Committee and was secretary to Senator McMillan, and accompanied as a factotum Senator McMillan and others, who went abroad as an artistic aggregation on one of the finest junkets ever prepared and visited Paris and Florence and sampled all of the different kinds of fine arts? Is not this the man who made the vouchers and who claims to be an artist and never got any artistic ideas except what he got in such a way and now assumes to regulate everything in Washington? [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He went over to Europe about a year ago, and I do not know how many months he was gone away from his employment. He promised to give the Government, and took oath to give the Government, his full time. His answer was that he went over there to help the War Department to locate and beautify the cemeteries of our soldiers, when more than half of his time was spent entirely away from that business. The gentleman, however, did not charge that expense to this account. He spent $289, if my memory is correct, in a junketing trip out to the Yosemite National Park. I asked him what he did that for, and he said, "To look at the floor of the valley." I suggested to him that God Almighty put that floor there, and that his desecrating hand should never be permitted to touch it. [Laughter and applause.] I will tell you what we did. In order that this gentleman might at least know what the law is, we copied that portion of it and put it into this bill, providing how this appropriation should be spent, so that he would realize that he has not any right, if he stays there, to charge up this character of expense.

I will tell you another thing they did. The statute provides they can hire help. In the first place, they started out in a moderate way, and under the law Col. Sherrill, an officer of the Army, and his predecessors, as custodian of public buildings and grounds, was the real secretary, but the acting secretary is an employee. Col. Sherrill does not get anything, and of course does not know anything about this office. But in order that Mr. Moore may have somebody to travel with him every time he goes down to New York he takes this assistant secretary with him. They are not content to ride on an ordinary train, that an ordinary Congressman would ride on, but they travel on the Congressional Limited, and charge up the extra fare to the Government. He would not walk, if you please; he would not take a street car from the station. He always takes a taxi. There are taxi bills here for $8, $9, or $10, and when asked what they were for he said they were for the whole commission. And yet the law requires each one of these men to certify to his individual account.

But we put a limitation on the amount they could pay the secretary. We had the secretary before us. I think it would be your judgment that if we paid him $1,500 that would be a waste of money. We reduced the amount of this appropriation to $6,000, which will be ample if properly expended. I will tell you another thing he did. He got out about 150 reports, and spent $1,500 in getting them out. I think that is correct. He got out 75 and bound them in buckram for distribution among the elect at $50 and some odd each.

If you have not seen that thing, you ought to see it. It is a thing of beauty, even if it is not a joy forever. It has beautiful scenes from France and other places where he was hobnobbing, and incidentally it is a beautiful advertisement for the purchase of Mount Hamilton out here, which, in his dream-like fancy, he wants to establish as a botanic garden, but which God Almighty never intended to be anything except a haunt for ground hogs.

Mr. LANGLEY. Is it not a fact that the Government already owns here in the city abundant land for at least five botanic gardens, as fine as any civilized country in the world has?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; but that would not conform with the idea of selling several hundred lots that are being priced and advertised for sale. The inducement seemed to be, for the sale of those lots, that the Congress of the United States has determined to locate a botanic garden at Mount Hamilton.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What salary does this artistic person receive?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He does not get anything, presumably, except his traveling expenses.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does the Fine Arts Commission employ this gentleman?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Here is what he does. He was one of the original members of this commission, and the law provides that they are appointed for a period of four years, or until their successors are appointed or have qualified.

As I understand it, he has been there ever since the thing was created in 1910, and it was created at his suggestion. And here is the worst thing about this business——

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. He is subject to removal at any time by the President, is he not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He is.

Mr. DOWELL. Does the President appoint him?

Mr. LANGLEY. The Librarian of Congress appoints him, does he not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; he is appointed by the President.

Mr. LANGLEY. I mean to the position of chief of division in the Library.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KING. He is appointed for a period of four years.

Mr. DOWELL. Can the gentleman give the date of his appointment?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. I was trying to find some notes that I have here that would throw light upon it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman is looking it up will he yield to me for a suggestion?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not fair to say, however, about Mr. Moore that he was secretary of the Senate committee which prepared the report known as the McMillan plan, and he has been chairman of the Fine Arts Commission for a considerable time, and that since he prepared the McMillan plan and submitted it to Congress, without exception whenever Congress has provided for any improvement it has followed the recommendations of the McMillan plan quietly and servilely, and still continues to do so in every report that comes from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr LANGLEY And yet Congress never approved of that plan.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman from Illinois is right about that thing, and the divers and sundry ways that he has of influencing us to do those things have always been a matter past my understanding.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps it can not be explained, but nevertheless it is a fact.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is a fact.

Mr. KING. Of course, the designer of the McMillan plan was Daniel Hudson Burnham. Mr. Moore was not the designer of the McMillan plan, nor was Senator McMillan. Mr. Moore never did anything in regard to it except to write a history of Burnham's life, which has been sold.

Mr. MANN. I was here when the McMillan plan was submitted. My colleague from Illinois did not have the honor of being here then. What I said about it is true.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that the architect of the World's Fair was the real designer of the plan?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; he had something to do with it.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. On what pay roll is this man carried?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. On the pay roll of the Library of Congress, and I understand he has to do with manuscripts.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Then the Librarian of Congress is his executive officer and has the power of removal, has he not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. He has not the power of removing him from the Commission on the Fine Arts.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Then, if he is certified and has drawn salary for time that he was not serving the Government, the Librarian of Congress has violated his duty also.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That may be true. Here is another thing that has happened here, and it shows one of the abuses that may be brought about through an Executive order. The functions provided in the statute originally for this man to perform were very simple, to pass upon monuments and models for monuments in the city of Washington. He has had Executive orders from every President from the date of his appointment down to and including the present President, and his duties have extended far beyond those proposed by the original statute; and, as I understand it, there can not be an Executive order, founded upon a law at least, that can be broader than the foundation upon which that Executive order is based. In consequence of those Executive orders you can not build a pigpen in the city of Washington to-day without violating one of these Executive orders, unless you get the consent of Mr. Moore.

Somebody is proposing to build a new hotel down here on New Jersey avenue, near the House Office Building; but these gentlemen not only gave them to understand that they must obtain their sanction, but they sent word to all the neighbors to come down and make such suggestions as they might have to make with respect to the construction of that building. We have inserted in the hearings a great many of those things with which they have been connected. I want to call your attention to a few of them, to show how far afield they have gone in their assumption of power. They have passed upon park lodges. They have passed upon the palisades of the Potomac. There is a rock there which they think ought not to be there, and they want it removed. [Laughter.]

They are passing on the National Botanic Garden. Their original duty, as I stated, was to pass upon monuments. They pass upon the Piney Branch playground or parkway. Children can not play unless they have a place to play in that is provided for by the Fine Arts Commission. [Laughter.] They pass upon the Meridian Hill Park design. They pass upon the park system of the District of Columbia. They pass upon the Knights of Columbus memorial, and they pass upon the Soldiers' Home, upon gilding the dome out there at the Soldiers' Home. They pass upon what the warrant officer's insignia shall be. A captain or a sergeant can not get up an insignia of his office without having the assent and the consent of the Fine Arts Commission. [Laughter.] Then they pass also upon street car extensions. Think of it, passing upon street car extensions in Washington! They pass upon the gold-star memorial at Des Moines. They pass upon the Frankford (Pa.) memorial design, and upon the Titanic memorial.

They pass upon ornaments for gravestones in the American cemeteries in France. They pass upon grading plans for Potomac Park and the laying out of playgrounds in the District of Columbia, and they pass upon the tuberculosis hospital in the District of Columbia and upon the Rock Creek Park projects and culverts. They pass upon the Missouri centennial coins and they have passed upon the Walter Reed Hospital extension. You can not build a hospital without getting the consent of the Fine Arts Commission. They passed upon the Dupont Monument. They pass upon designs for United States currency. They tell us that that bob-tailed buffalo bull on the nickel of the United States is a thing of artistic merit [laughter], and, finally, as another beautiful evidence of their artistic genius, they took and put Gen. Grant upon a pedestal down here in this hole below the Capitol, and they placed Grant with his back and his horse with his tail turned toward the Capitol. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANGLEY. He told me the reason that the Fine Arts Commission placed the statue facing in that direction was that Grant was always marching westward.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. LANGLEY. Did not the Fine Arts Commission also approve the design for the peace dollar?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Does not Mr. Moore insist that the Fine Arts Commission pass on these matters by direction of the President?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Through Executive order.

Mr. MANN. The President directs them.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it any criticism of Mr. Moore that the Fine Arts Commission by direction of the President give their time to these matters without pay?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My criticism of the gentleman is that he has absolutely taken unto himself duties that were never intended, and has become so thoroughly obsessed with his own importance that he has made a farce of the whole thing. That is what he has done. He has gone far beyond the purview of the legitimate design of Congress in creating this thing.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that when the Fine Arts Commission was created for the purpose indicated in the statute which the gentleman has quoted, President Roosevelt issued an order which was binding upon the executive departments of the Government, directing them to refer all matters of this sort to the Fine Arts Commission for their opinion?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that that order has continued in force ever since—under Presidents Roosevelt, Taft, and Wilson—and has frequently been extended? And is it any criticism of the Fine Arts Commission that, without expense to the Government, they do examine into these matters when the President has directed the executive officers to ask for their opinion?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. This is my criticism, that this gentleman is never content with his present authority. So with each incoming President he makes it bigger, so that he is constantly and eternally taking upon himself, through Executive orders, things that never were intended at all; and he has gone so far as to say that he should have within his jurisdiction the control of these Capitol Grounds; that has been denied him; and he has even offered objections because the pigpen down at Occoquan was not put in the right place to add to the artistic beauty of that institution down there.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. Frequent reference has been made to the McMillan plan. Has that ever been approved by Congress?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Of course it has not. He would have you believe, in these reports that he has sent out, that it is a part of the organic law of the country. The McMillan plan was originally the plan of L'Enfant. The design originated with L'Enfant, but it is just simply the dream of this man, absolutely impracticable of fulfillment. You would have to tear out everything down on Pennsylvania Avenue. You would have to tear out a thousand things that will remain there a thousand years before they are torn out.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does not the gentleman think it would be a good thing if a lot of those structures down on Pennsylvania Avenue were torn down?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; but I will not discuss that.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Does the gentleman know of any place where the sublime and the ridiculous are so much intermixed as in the city of Washington?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. And would it not be well for the Fine Arts Commission to continue its efforts in spite of the statement of the gentleman?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If you want to subscribe to this kind of thing, you can.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does not the gentleman think the Fine Arts Commission ought to remove the building at Fifteenth and H Streets NE., that stands conspicuously at the eastern terminus of that beautiful avenue—Maryland Avenue—a toilet room right in the middle of it—while the Capitol of the Nation is at the other end?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is one thing that ought not to be. Maryland Avenue NE. is one of the prettiest streets in the city of Washington. At this end of it is the Capitol of the greatest Nation on earth, and at the other end of it, under the sanction of the Fine Arts Commission, is a toilet house in the middle of the street, not only unsightly but extremely dangerous. [Laughter.]

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman has stated all these things. What is his conclusion as to the remedy?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My remedy is to fire this man.

Mr. MICHENER. How will that be brought about?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I was motoring out Maryland Avenue with the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], and we passed the building that the gentleman from Indiana has mentioned, and he said that was the end of a perfect way. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to call attention, if you please, to the Alien Property Custodian. When we got into the war one of the first things we did was to pass a law creating the Alien Property Custodian. Under that law it became the duty of the Alien Property Custodian to take into his charge all the property of alien enemies in this country or in any of our possessions. In consequence of that, property of the value of a little more than $400,000,000 was taken under his control. All of it, except about $9,000,000, is still in his custody and control. There are some 37 active trusts under his control and management. He is conducting almost every character of business throughout the United States. Of course, it is supposed that, so far as this business itself is concerned, it is conducted without expense to the United States Government, but we are entailing the expense of all that it is costing us to keep in existence the office of the Alien Property Custodian during the time he is supervising this other business and discharging the obligations of his trust.

Now, I know that it is the desire of the present administrator of this trust that the Congress of the United States prescribe some way whereby this thing can be wound up. I expect within the confines of the district of each man here there is some one that has his or her money tied up in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, and it is resulting in very great hardship. I have some cases in my district. Now, there are two or three ways whereby this thing may be done. In the first place, we may confiscate the property. We would have a right to do that under the rules of war, perhaps even as modified by The Hague convention. But no one has ever conceived that we would confiscate it. We have millions of dollars of claims against Germany. Some have claimed that we should hold this property until those claims are liquidated, that we should hold it as an inducement for them to liquidate our claims.

But some method must of necessity be prescribed, and it is not to the credit of the United States that this thing should be longer delayed. For it is resulting in great hardship all over the country. The war is over, peace has been declared, and the countries with which we were at war have property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian. One of the best ways to get back to peace is in practicing peace.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I am much interested in this statement of the gentleman. I have a constituent who has property in the hands of the Alien Custodian, and I want to know as to this trust. This man is the administrator of some legatees in Germany.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The law creating the trust prescribed that the property shall remain in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian until such time as the Congress of the United States prescribes a method for its disposition, so that the trustee has no choice about it at all.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. ROACH. The gentleman is on the committee and has made some investigation as to the department of the Alien Property Custodian. How long does the gentleman think it would take to thoroughly and systematically close up the affairs in that bureau and dispose of them?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would take but a short length of time after a plan had been agreed upon.

Mr. ROACH. Does not the gentleman believe that such action should be taken immediately by Congress?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think so. I think this present Congress before it adjourns should provide some way for disposing of this property.

Mr. ROACH. I fully agree with the gentleman.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Now, I want to call attention to another activity created by the last Congress and which is now functioning, and that is the General Accounting Office. The General Accounting Office is the direct agent of the Congress of the United States. It took the place of the Comptroller of the Treasury Department. The Comptroller of the Treasury Department from the creation of the office was not only dependent upon those over him but likewise on corresponding deputies at the heads of other establishments. For the first time since the creation of the Government we have an independent accounting officer.

He is not dependent upon any bureau or Cabinet officer or the head of any department. It is the duty of the general accounting officer to see that the moneys appropriated are properly expended and that nothing is vouchered unless it is for a proper expenditure of money. It is his duty to inquire into the operation of the various branches of the Government that he may advise Congress as to whether the conduct of their office is proper, in his opinion. From this much good has already come, and from it there is a possibility of getting away from the archaic practices so far as form and detail in many offices is concerned.

One of the first things this officer did was to do away with 80 out of 86 forms that had been in vogue and practice in the office for a long time. And the same archaic things that exist there are existing in many other places. The appropriation made in this bill is $380,000 more than the appropriation for the service last year. I want to tell you why. The appropriation last year was $675,000 less than the appropriation for 1921, and in regard to this increased appropriation the General Accounting Office is custodian and has in its possession all of the accounting papers pertaining to the service of every soldier that ever served in any war in this country clear back to the formation of it, including the service of every soldier in the World War.

The Veterans' Bureau can not get a complete history of the service of any man who served in the World War without coming to the General Accounting Office. There are millions and millions of unpaid and undetermined accounts, claims of soldiers of the Civil War. Somebody has started up the idea throughout the country that every boy who served in the Army has got an unpaid balance coming to him from the United States. Many of you Members have had letters about it. They are coming in by millions each month and require the activities of this office to determine whether or not there is any merit in them. Not one in 500 is found where there is anything due the soldier. In most cases where they have investigated they have found that the balance is due from the soldier to the United States Government.

Added to that is the present plan of paying interest on registered bonds. More than 4,000,000 checks come into the Treasury of the United States each quarter in payment of the interest upon these registered bonds. These are in a much muddled condition. The comptroller tells us that with this additional appropriation this can be gotten up to date and kept current, so that the records can be preserved for the future. The trouble is that many of them are practically worn out by usage, and with this amount of money these things can be preserved. Their value can not be calculated. There are still occasions to go back to inquire in respect to payments to those who served in the Revolutionary War and thousands of those who served in the Civil War.

There is another thing to which this office is subjected that should be remedied at the earliest possible moment, which would result in a saving of many thousands of dollars to the United States Government. The auditor's office to-day employs nearly 1,500 people in the city of Washington. They are scattered throughout 15 different buildings, in 15 different parts of the city.

The clerks are in small rooms, for the most part, seven or eight ordinarily, hardly ever more than a dozen in a room, each with a boss over them and some with a subboss. All of these activities should be housed in one building, properly fitted for this work, and the present comptroller tells us that if this were possible he could reduce the expense of the General Accounting Office by one-half. These records that I am speaking of are scattered in nine different buildings throughout the city of Washington; most of them are in basements. Some of the most valuable records, records that could not be reproduced at all if they were destroyed, are to-day stored in the basement under Poli's Theater.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I call attention to the fact that there is a proposition pending before the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to provide for this situation, and hearings will be held at a very early date and steps taken to correct the difficulties to which the gentleman has so forcefully referred.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am very glad that that is true. What we ought to have, in my opinion, and I offer it only as a suggestion, are housing facilities for these activities, so that they could be gotten together, not only for the good of management, but for the economical reason that it would save thousands of dollars of expense to the Government.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman permit a word of explanation there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. These offices were separate and distinct before the passage of the accounting act, and under the law they were left in the quarters then occupied and will probably remain there until some definite arrangement can be made to house them under one roof.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That ought to be done, and some provision ought to be made for the purpose of concentrating these records that I tell you are scattered about in the basements of various buildings. They ought to be placed somewhere where they will be secure, some place where it is fireproof. Now, gentlemen of the committee, I have hurriedly gone over this bill and have touched some of the high places where I felt you would be interested. I know that during the consideration of the five-minute rule there will be ample opportunity to further discuss them.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Just as I came into the Chamber I heard the gentleman speak of the preservation of the records. Will not this Congress provide for the erection of an archives building for that purpose?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know whether it will or not, but here is my idea about it: There are 1,400 people, as stated awhile ago, engaged in the various auditors' departments, now all under the control and supervision of the general accounting officer. They should all be together so that there could be one unit of supervision. According to the present accounting officer the expense could be reduced one-half if that were done, and then these records which are valuable to the discharge of the duty of the accounting office should be in that accounting office. They are scattered throughout nine different buildings in nine different parts of the town—in cellars, subways, and so forth—and if I were doing the thing which I think is most practicable, I would have the accounting office house these activities in one building for the purpose of taking care of them.

Mr. FESS. I was told recently by one in authority that in case a certain building—I think he named the Poli Theater Building—should burn, and the records stored there be destroyed, most of our evidences in the Land Office would be gone?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I just called attention to that fact. That is correct.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The archives building would not be suitable at all for the documents and files belonging to the General Accounting Office. The nature of the archives building relates to matter entirely outside the question of accounting, and the law places the files of the accounting office under the jurisdiction of the Comptroller General and they must remain there. For that reason there must be a segregation so that the files of the General Accounting Office, which means the financial end of the Government on the debit and credit sides, for revenues and disbursements, will be by themselves under the direct management and control of the Comptroller General. Then, the records of the executive branches of the service are entirely outside of that, and for historical purposes. The two can not be lodged under one and the same management.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman did not explain to us the proposed United States Veterans' Bureau appropriation.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I omitted that, and I am very glad the gentleman called attention to it. I desire to say a word or two with reference to the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman pardon me if I ask a question before he commences?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Very well.

Mr. DUNBAR. I note that the appropriation for 1922 in regular, annual, and deficiency acts, and so forth, as submitted by the gentleman's committee, is $295,000,000, and that the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury contained in this annual report is $438,000,000. How does the gentleman account for the difference?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I shall try as best I can to give the gentleman a summary of it. For expense of operation in the District of Columbia we recommended $25,815,942, which is $1,105,760 less than the amount requested in the Budget.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman is dealing with 1923, and I am asking about 1922. I am asking about the difference for the year 1922, and the gentleman is explaining for the year 1923.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. What about 1922?

Mr. DUNBAR. The appropriations for 1922 are $295,000,000. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that you spent $438,000,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, I was going to give you the figures we have for this arrangement. The deduction we made on this amounts to $1,105,760. We recommend an appropriation of $160,000,000 for the compensation claims, which is $35,000,000 more than the amount appropriated in 1922. The decentralization cost, it is worth while to call to the attention of Congress, is $14,000,000 annually, and will continue to cost that amount as long as that decentralization exists. The vocational training allowance is $127,000,000 as against $105,000,000 for 1922.

The basic allowance for trainees at the present time is $115. That ranges all the way from $180 down to $80 that the United States Government is now paying for compensation. In addition, we are paying to the institution where he is receiving his education, his transportation, and for his tools and books, and whatever else he may need. So that the total per month is $142. We have now about 22,000 of these trainees, and in the opinion of Col. Forbes that number will increase until we reach the peak, in 1924, when it is estimated that we will have 104,000 of these trainees. If that is correct, and if the rate of their tuition and compensation keeps up where it is now, figure for yourselves the amount of that increase from now on. We are also giving for this compensation $160,000,000, which is $35,000,000 more than the amount appropriated in 1922, for the compensation claims are constantly increasing. We are paying out now at the rate of about $12,000,000 a month in compensation claims. It is estimated that it will increase from month to month throughout this year, so that at about the last of the fiscal year 1923 we will be paying out between $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 a month in these compensation claims.

One of the things that I expect you gentlemen have heard about, but, if not, you will hear much about before this discussion is over, is concerning this vocational training. There are thousands and thousands of vocational trainees scattered all over this country, some of them in the institutions that are established for general educational purposes, some of them in private concerns, some of them in factories, and some of them in the various walks of life, each of them being permitted to select the place that he desires in which to fit himself for his future life pursuit.

It has been suggested that there should be a World War Veterans' university established, or a number of these established, and that the abandoned cantonments should be utilized for that purpose. There was never any legislation authorizing or warranting anything of that character, but under the general provisions of the Sweet bill it was assumed that this thing might be done, and in consequence the director undertook the establishment of an institution of this character and did establish it at Chillicothe, or Fort Sherman, Ohio.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Is there any authority of law for the establishment by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau of nautical schools for these veterans?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is not.

Mr. WALSH. I noticed an item to the effect that the director is visiting several points along the Atlantic coast with the view of setting up such an institution.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That information came to me while we were fixing up this bill. Within a week I called him up and asked him whether he had any intention of establishing a nautical school. He said he had no intention of doing so at present; that all he was doing was gathering information looking to the advisability of doing it, and promised if he undertook that thing he would come to Congress and ask for authority. To my mind there was no authority for establishing this Camp Sherman institution; but it was established, and they have now some 300 students. They have a nicely assembled equipment, not only there, but brought in from all over the country, for the purpose of establishing a university for the purpose of all vocational training and teaching.

A great objection has been urged to that by a large number of soldiers of the Civil War, and they voiced their objections through a brief submitted to the committee and which was made a part of the minutes by Judge Marks, a judge in Cincinnati, Ohio, and who is an officer of one of these soldier activities. And one of the prime objections offered by him was a psychological objection. As you know, under the law these men must be at least 10 per cent incapacitated before they are entitled to receive national vocational training. This would result in the segregation of thousands who were diseased or incapacitated by wounds or otherwise in that camp. Those opposing this sort of a camp claim that their best interests could be subserved, not in segregating them together, but in scattering them in institutions throughout the country where they can come in contact with boys who are not afflicted or wounded, but who look on the sunny side of life. Another objection is because of the fact that everything is suggestive of the military. They go back to an old, abandoned military camp. They are subjected, more or less, to military discipline. They are provided for as they were provided for in the Army, so far as their sustenance is concerned, and in eating in the mess, and so forth. So that within the time they are preparing themselves they are imbued with the idea, until it becomes an obsession, that they are charges on the Government, and so that these institutions, instead of being educational institutions, would be more like old-soldiers' homes. These objections are made in arguments of those who are in favor of the establishment of these institutions. One of the other things that should be taken into consideration in that equation is this—that these would be but temporary at least. This training will be over in a very, very few years. So it looked the part of bad business to spend a lot of money to establish a thing that must be abandoned in a short space of time.

And another objection is that to establish a university, established as a university should be established, to teach the soldiers of this country as they should be taught is a matter of years of experience and can not be done in so short a time. Another objection is that the overhead of this institution would be incomparably more than the overhead of taking care of a like number of students at another place. It is estimated that there now it is costing $70 a month, where at other institutions it is not costing to exceed $20 a month. That is answered by the fact that if this is permitted to go on it will be cheaper in the end than the other institutions, because the overhead for 1,000 would be no greater than for 300. This is what we are going to do, and we are going to ask Congress to approve it. We do not want to take and strike this thing down if it is the success that its friends think it will be, but we do not want to go out and enlarge it unless we know that it will be a success; so we put a limitation upon it, providing that no other institution of this character should be established, and that the attendance at this institution should be limited to 1,000. That is 500 more than those who object to it thought should be there. That limitation was agreeable to Col. Forbes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Would it not be better under the circumstances which the gentleman describes to make provision for this training in the colleges and schools that we already have?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what has been done heretofore. This work is increasing. But these students are being absorbed all around the country. To express my own opinion, I think it would have been better to have continued along that line.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. FESS. The promoters of that legislation never had in mind the idea of professional education. The education was to be vocational, and it was thought that two years at least would be the maximum time, because the wording of the law was that anyone who returned incapacitated to resume his customary work or incapacitated to take up any work without training should receive that training. It was never thought of taking up general education by the Government and building up universities. I think the committee is to be congratulated for putting its foot on that. I would like to know what we are being let into if we start this kind of an institution. As one interested in this legislation I have been very much chagrined to see the turn that it has taken. I think it is an expenditure of money that has not given us what we expected. The great newspapers of the country started out with glaring charges against vocational work on the ground that we were not teaching those who were worthy. We were then making an expenditure of $30,000,000, and I announced that if it was kept up we would spend $100,000,000 or more. I think the committee ought to be congratulated and supported by the House in trying to keep this within the range of the original purview of the law.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. My recollection and understanding of this matter is that the camp that the bureau has established in Ohio is not a university or an institution engaged in general educational work, but it is confined to trades and to place there men who have been disabled.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. What is proposed is a university where they teach not only technical trades but scientific branches.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is it not a fact that Col. Forbes said he did not intend to send boys there, but did intend to send them to general educational institutions in the country?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. He does not say that. But this is one of the arguments in its behalf: That it would furnish an avenue for boys who could not be received in other places.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; boys who could not be entered in other schools.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Is this training restricted to those who returned from the service incapacitated in some way?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman sure of that?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. He would have to be at least 10 per cent incapacitated in order to be entitled to admission. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Indiana what his disposition is about running to-day? How long does he expect to run?

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] desire to go on now? If not, I would like to go on myself.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman from Virginia will permit, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wants a little time. I will yield to him 40 minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. All right.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I did not understand whether the gentleman from Indiana answered the question of my colleague from Tennessee. How long does he want to run?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think we should get away by 5 o'clock. I am tired myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] for one hour.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago my very great friend from Michigan, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. FORDNEY], wandering in his mind around the country, located himself at Chicago and proceeded to do what very few citizens of our city would do, probably; he made a rather violent attack upon Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, because they had exercised their right in expressing opposition to what is called the American valuation plan, so dear to the heart of the gentleman from Michigan.

I have always found myself that it was a very wise thing in making statements of facts to be sure of the facts, and when I predicate opinion upon facts I like to know the facts. The gentleman from Michigan, with some flourish and considerable dramatic effect, produced before the House a knife, and in connection with that made this statement:

A man whose name I will not mention saw an article by a large importing firm in Chicago opposing American valuation and later saw my reply thereto. He informed me that a friend of his had recently returned from Germany, where he had purchased a knife. That knife was purchased for 18 or 19 marks at retail in Germany. The exchange value of those marks that day was 9.6 cents in gold. That knife was made by the firm of J. A. Henckel, a manufacturer of high-grade cutlery in Germany.

Later on:

I went to the Secretary of the Treasury and asked him to give me a man whom I could send to Chicago to purchase some articles. That man purchased this knife and furnished me a sales slip at that same department store week before last, the same knife, and I have the sales slip—$5—sold by the same firm, the same knife, less valuable than the one sold in Germany a short time ago for 9.6 cents.

Later in the remarks of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], in answer to a question, he made this statement:

My God, man, where on this knife they have made a profit of 3,900 per cent, what sense would there be in increasing it?

I think every Member of the House who heard the speech received the impression, probably intended by the gentleman from Michigan, that the firm of Marshall Field & Co. had imported this knife and sold it at a profit of 3,900 per cent, or thereabouts.

In the course of the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] he was interrupted by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], who said:

On the subject of the American valuation, to take a specific instance, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means stated that a knife manufactured in Germany and sold there for 9.6 cents was imported to this country and sold by Marshall Field & Co., of Chicago, at retail for $5.

And later in the speech the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] again said:

As I understand, it would be something like a duty of 6 cents on this knife which they buy in Germany for a little over 9 cents, pay the 6 cents duty on, and then sell the knife in this country for $5.

Of course, I have no means personally of knowing whether the original statement that the man had bought this knife in Germany for 9.6 cents is true or not, though I question whether you can buy a good steel knife manufactured by Henckel & Co. in Germany or anywhere else so cheaply as that; but if it could be purchased at that price the firm of Marshall Field & Co. would have been very willing to pay a large commission to the man who could have furnished that firm the information. The knife that was purchased from Marshall Field & Co. was not imported by them from Germany. They bought it in this country from people who, I suppose, had imported it, and they paid more than 25 times the price which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] said the knife sold for in Germany. It would be advisable, as I say, to get facts before making statements or drawing conclusions. The firm of Marshall Field & Co. do not care to say the exact price which they paid for this knife, because that is a trade secret, though they did show me the bill for the knife, which bill they paid in purchasing it from a firm in New York City, and the price at which it was sold at retail by them was a fair price in comparison with the price which they paid for it. If the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], or any other gentleman, can import such knives from Germany at the price named in the speech as the basis of the argument which was made, he can sell them to Marshall Field & Co. or to a great many other concerns in this country at a vast profit to himself. It was all pure bunk—that is what it was.

My friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] exhibited some soap which he called a cake of sandalwood bath soap, imported from England, and he gave the date of the entry, April 5, 1921. He gave the English selling price, the rate of duty, and the total net cost laid down, less transportation, which he said was 26 cents and a fraction, and that the retail selling price was 50 cents, and that the profit was 86 per cent. We have traced the entry, and it was not for bath soap at all and had no comparison with the soap which the gentleman referred to. The entry and the price under the entry were for an extra fine toilet soap, and the exhibit offered by the gentleman had nothing to do with the entry.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] referred to some dotted swiss. He said:

The sixth exhibit is a dress fabric known as dotted swiss, and was imported from Switzerland. The seventh exhibit is a piece of dress fabric known as Japanese crêpe imported from Japan.

My friend from Michigan gave the date of the entry, the selling price abroad, the dutiable value, the amount of the duty, the total cost of the item laid down in this country, and the retail selling price, and of course he exhibited a wide difference between the cost in this country and the selling price. The only difficulty about it is that it has nothing to do with the facts in the case. The item of dotted swiss referred to in his exhibit, which we have been able to identify under the exhibit, was bought by Marshall Field & Co. for their 1922 business and has not yet been opened up, much less put on sale.

The item of Japanese crêpe referred to by the gentleman from Michigan was not imported by Marshall Field & Co., and had no relation to the entry, which they referred to, but was purchased by the firm of Marshall Field & Co. in New York City in white, and dyed to their specifications; so that in no event, if you had had the foreign selling price, would that have anything to do with the value when it was placed on sale here.

My friend from Michigan exhibited with a good deal of interest some pin cubes—cubes of pins. The pin cubes, Exhibits 11 and 12, which he referred to by the date of entry as having been entered October 18, 1921, have never yet been put on sale; so, of course, it was impossible for his friend, the customs officer in Chicago, to buy them, and he did not buy them. The pin cubes which were sold by Marshall Field & Co., and which were produced here by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] as having been purchased at the retail store of Marshall Field & Co., were from a purchase made either just prior to our entering the war or else more probably from shipments of September 27, 1920, and July 9, 1920, after the armistice. Of these goods the accumulated cost of the goods held at Rotterdam amounted to as much if not more than they were actually sold for. These pin cubes covered by shipments of September 27, 1920, and July 9, 1920, cost Marshall Field & Co. 4.7 cents a cube and 7 cents a cube, two kinds, both kinds being sold for 5 cents a cube, less than cost, notwithstanding the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] in his statement estimated a profit of 175 per cent in one case and 110 per cent in the other case.

The small pin cubes which were produced here cost Marshall Field & Co., one kind 2.9 cents a cube, or a trifle less than 3 cents a cube, and the other 4.9 cents a cube, a trifle less than 5 cents a cube, and both kinds were sold for 2.5 cents a cube, at a loss.

At times when I have looked over some of these facts I have thought that the customs officer who did this business in Chicago—I am inclined to think not within the scope of his employment—was not very well selected. His judgment was not very good. If they propose to have American valuation based upon the judgment of men of that kind in making comparisons of values who can not get any closer than this customs officer came the Lord pity the country. [Applause.]

My friend from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] exhibited what was of great interest in the House, a number of human-hair nets. I think very few Members of the House make personal use of human-hair nets, but I noticed that every one was paying special attention to the subject, either because he knew something about it, or, if he did not, would like to learn. He gave the date of the entry of Exhibit 18 and stated that the increase or profit would be 652 per cent. He said on Exhibit 19 the percentage of increase or profit would be 976 per cent, and on exhibit 20 the percentage of increase or profit would be 1,104 per cent. On Exhibit 21 he stated that the increase or profit would be 1,126 per cent.

Now, everybody will admit that even the lowest of these, 652 per cent profit, is a considerable profit for the sale of goods. It was unfortunate, however, that the facts as given by the gentleman from Michigan do not comport with the actual facts. I think the gentleman from Michigan made this statement:

These hair nets, Exhibits 18, 19, 20, and 21, were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, arriving in enormous quantities by registered parcel post from China. The four exhibits are positively identified by this examiner as being comparable in all respects with certain other similar woman's human-hair nets imported by the firm in question and covered by the entry of November 12, 1921.

He refers to these hair nets as identical or comparable with the hair nets imported by Marshall Field & Co. on November 12, 1921. The gentleman from Michigan, if I recollect correctly, said that his man paid 50 cents for hair nets. The hair nets covered by this importation have not been placed on sale anywhere. The hair nets of that grade are sold by Marshall Field & Co. two for a quarter for the ordinary colors, and 25 cents each for gray and white. They are sold all over the country at that price. In Chicago they sell them in the drug stores and all sorts of places at a standard price—not 50 cents apiece, as stated by the gentleman from Michigan, but two for a quarter for that grade of hair net.

These nets are imported in bulk by parcel post, sent to the workrooms of Marshall Field & Co., where they import them, and where each net is individually examined, graded, and put into an envelope. In these importations there are many classed as first class, others, a large proportion, as second and rejects.

After throwing out the seconds and the rejects the perfect nets are sold two for a quarter in the regular colors and 25 cents each for white and gray, notwithstanding the gentleman from Michigan stated that his man had purchased out of this importation nets and paid 50 cents for them. It was not true. What he did purchase was a large superquality net which sells in different grades from 35 cents to 40 cents. But those are not the nets described in the entry named by the gentleman from Michigan, and are not based on the prices named by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to have read in my time the full statement by Marshall Field & Co.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT BY MARSHALL FIELD & CO.

On page 639 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 21, 1921, Mr. FORDNEY makes the definite statement that Marshall Field & Co. had made a profit of 3,900 per cent on the sale of a knife purchased from J. A. Henckel in Germany for 9.6 cents, which knife was sold in our retail store for $5. Mr. FORDNEY submitted in evidence the knife in question.

We positively deny the accuracy of this statement.

The specific knife which sold in our retail store for $5 was bought by us in America and cost us more than twenty-five times the amount Mr. FORDNEY states was paid for it in Germany. We do not mention the exact cost, because we regard this information as a trade secret.

Mr. FORDNEY has repeatedly attacked us on the floor of the House and has been making speeches through the country, centering his attacks upon us and making the same statement with regard to the Henckel knife, which appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The Congressman arranged through the customs officials for the purchase of certain articles in our retail store and the identification of them with certain of our importations. The foreign values, duties, and estimated costs, together with our selling prices, were then transmitted to Congressman FORDNEY.

Following are quotations from his report with our answers:

The third exhibit is a cake of sandalwood bath soap imported from England:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, April 5, 1921.
English selling price, $0.20498 per cake.
Duty, 30 per cent ad valorem, $0.061494.
All nondutiable elements of cost appearing on invoice, $0.000931.
Total net laid-down cost, less transportation, $0.2674.
Retail selling price, $0.50.
Difference, $0.2326.
Percentage of increase, 86 per cent.

This sample was purchased by a customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, which arrives in substantial quantities from England. He positively identifies the exhibit as being identical with certain other sandalwood bath soap imported by the firm in question. This is the same article sold in a store in this city, December 14, at 50 cents.

The soap referred to by Mr. FORDNEY in this entry has never been on sale in our retail store. The soap covered by this entry is a toilet soap, not a bath soap, as described.

The sixth exhibit is a dress fabric known as dotted Swiss, and was imported from Switzerland:

INFORMATION FROM INVOICE ACCOMPANYING IDENTICAL OR COMPARABLE MERCHANDISE.

Date of entry, October 18, 1921.
Swiss selling price, $0.559912.
Dutiable value, $0.59453.
Duty 25 per cent ad valorem, plus 7 cents a pound, $0.15447.

The exhibits of dress fabrics, which I have given as 6, 7, and 8, namely, dotted Swiss, Japanese crêpe, and embroidered organdie, were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on classes of merchandise indicated by the samples which arrive in Chicago in large quantities. The examiner positively identifies the samples as being comparable in all respects and identical in quality with other dress fabrics imported by the department store in question, and covered in the entries of October 17, 1921, and October 18, 1921, above mentioned.

The item of dotted Swiss referred to in Exhibit 6 as having been imported October 18, 1921, was bought for our spring, 1922, business and has not yet been opened up and put on sale.

The item of Japanese crêpe referred to as Exhibit 7 was not imported by ourselves, but was purchased in New York in the white and dyed to our specifications.

The Japanese crêpe, which we did import under the entry number referred to, is sold in our retail store at 35 cents and not at 50 cents, as stated.

Exhibit 11 is a cube of steel, glass-headed pins, imported from Germany:

Date of entry, October 18, 1921.
German selling price, $0.015768 per cube.

This article is sold in some stores at 10 cents, an increase of 350 per cent.

Exhibit 12 is a cube of steel, glass-headed pins of smaller size than Exhibit 11, imported from Germany:

Date of entry, October 18, 1921.
German selling price, $0.010356 per cube.

Retail selling price, $0.025.
Difference, $0.0131.
Percentage of increase, 110 per cent.

Exhibits 11 and 12 were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise. He positively identifies the samples as being identical with certain other pins imported by the firm in question and covered by the entry of October 18, 1921, above mentioned.

The pin cubes referred to as Exhibits 11 and 12 as having been entered October 18, 1921, have not been put on sale.

The pin cubes which were sold in our retail store were either from a purchase made just prior to our entering the war or shipments of September 27, 1920, and July 9, 1920. The accumulated cost on the goods held at Rotterdam amounted to as much, if not more, than they were actually sold for. The goods covered by shipments September 27, 1920, and July 9, 1920, cost, large cubes, 4.7 cents and 7 cents, respectively, and both sold for 5 cents each. The small cubes cost 2.9 cents and 4.9 cents, respectively, and both sold for 2½ cents each.

Exhibit 18 is a woman's human-hair net imported from China, size 12 by 28, double mesh:

Exhibit 19 is also a hair net imported from China:

Percentage of increase, 1,126 per cent.

These hair nets, Exhibits 18, 19, 20, and 21, were purchased by the customs examiner who passes on this class of merchandise, arriving in enormous quantities by registered parcel post from China. The four exhibits are positively identified by this examiner as being comparable in all respects with certain other similar woman's human-hair nets imported by the firm in question and covered by the entry of November 12, 1921. The entry mentioned consisted entirely of woman's human-hair nets and covered 212,256 hair nets.

The cost of postage and of the tissue liner is included in the entered value, but the cost of an American envelope plus labor cost of inserting the net in the envelope is not included in the tabulation.

The hair nets, Exhibits 18, 19, 20, and 21, are referred to as identical or comparable with hair nets imported November 12, 1921.

The hair nets covered by this entry have not been placed on sale in our retail, but such nets in the perfect grade are sold two for 25 cents for the ordinary colors and at 25 cents each for gray and white.

These nets are imported in bulk and sent to our workroom, where each net is examined, graded, and put in an envelope. In each importation there is a large proportion of "seconds" and "rejects," and only the perfect grade is sold at the price of two for 25 cents in regular colors and 25 cents each for white and gray.

The nets referred to as purchased in our retail at 35 cents and 50 cents each are extra large superquality nets, purchased by us from dealers in this country and not our own importations.

Mr. FORDNEY, as a Government officer, has secured and made public records of our private transactions which have never been treated by a Government officer heretofore as other than strictly confidential.

That the American-valuation plan needs such gross misrepresentation of facts in order that it may be justified should be sufficient evidence that it is a measure that should not become a law.

It is against our policy to make public the volume or profits of our business, because there are no outside stockholding interests and all of our stock is held by people connected with the business.

In view of Congressman FORDNEY's charges we will, however, depart from our usual custom to say that in the year 1920 our total net sales were $183,600,000, and our net profit for the year after paying Federal taxes amounted to 2.39 cents upon each dollar's worth of sales.

The return on the capital engaged in the business for the year 1920 equaled only 6.3 per cent, or an amount not much in excess of a return on an investment in United States Government bonds.

As these figures are the result of our entire manufacturing, wholesale, and retail business, it might be interesting for you to know some figures for our retail business exclusively.

The average net profit for the years 1915 to 1920, inclusive, on each dollar's worth of sales made by our retail store after Federal taxes had been deducted was 4.00 cents.

Respectfully submitted.

MARSHALL FIELD & Co.,
By JOHN G. SHEDD, President.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think it is fair to call particular attention of the House to the statement just read, in view of the charge made by the gentleman from Michigan as to exorbitant profits, that the net profits of Marshall Field & Co. for the year 1920, the last year that it is made up to date, after paying the Federal taxes, amounted to less than 2.4 cents per dollar sales.

In the face of the charge made that this firm was exacting profit and were denominated by the gentleman from Michigan as profiteers to the extent of over 1,000 per cent, it is refreshing to get back to the earth and facts. Their profits were less than 2.4 cents on each dollar's worth of sales. And the total profit and return on the capital invested in the business was only 6.3 cents. Certainly not an exorbitant profit for that class of business.

In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read in my time a telegram from Marshall Field & Co. and one from the Chicago Association of Commerce on the last proposition relating to the American valuation plan.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., January 16, 1922.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Senator SMOOT's substitute of wholesale selling price in America of foreign or similar imported article for FORDNEY's American valuation plan, as reported in Chicago papers, would seem to make impossible a combination of American manufacturers to exclude foreign products by increasing duties thereon, but so far as we can judge from newspaper reports, substantially all other arguments against American valuation plan in Fordney bill are also applicable to this substitute plan. Wholesale selling prices in America for imported merchandise vary largely as between different cities; also it would be a difficult task, indeed, for anyone to determine accurately wholesale selling prices of many imported commodities in the same city, as prices often vary largely as between competitors in the same market. A great many importations of commodities are made by retailers and individuals which are not sold by wholesalers in America. What determines duties on such items? The determination of wholesale selling price would necessarily rest largely with employees of Treasury Department, which, we submit, gives Government employees entirely too much power for exercise of individual judgment and submits the import business to the same uncertainty in this respect that would obtain under American plan in Fordney bill. The proposed amendment will enable Congress to apparently levy a low percentage of customs duty, while, as a matter of actual fact, the protection accorded American manufacturers would be very much greater than the percentage figures in the bill would indicate. Much as we have studied the various proposals, we can not but feel that an item which cost $1 abroad upon which a duty of $1 must be paid in this country is protected just 100 per cent, and we believe that the people of this country are entitled to know that the protection is 100 per cent and not have their minds confused by calling it some other figure. We are not arguing whether duties should be 10 per cent or 1,000 per cent, but we insist that proposed departure from present basis of assessing duties on foreign cost or value is fundamentally wrong, will unnecessarily raise costs, and will deceive the public as to amount of protection accorded. By assessing duty on foreign cost or value, the importer can figure with some degree of certainty upon his landed cost and not be subjected to the whim, caprice, or elasticity of opinion of some Government employee to determine the wholesale selling price in America before he can figure amount of duty he must pay. A change in basis will lead to endless confusion and delay and will generally obstruct the free movement of commerce. We are manufacturers in America on a large scale, having manufacturing plants in seven States in the Union and in many lines, such as laces, curtains, nets, rugs, etc. We are competitive with foreign manufacturers. Our experience as manufacturer, retailer, wholesaler, importer advises against the change in the basis of assessing ad valorem duties.

MARSHALL FIELD & Co.

CHICAGO, ILL., January 17, 1922.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

After considering the Smoot amendments this association emphatically reiterates its unalterable opposition to any provision in the new tariff law for assessment of duty based on selling prices in the United States. Such a law would inevitably result in confusion and delay to business, would disrupt present system, be impossible of equitable administration, and would confer intolerable inquisitorial powers upon customs officers in determining dutiable value. Impossible to fix selling prices as to great majority of imported goods. Prices vary with every concern, locality, and condition of trade. The present most inopportune time to increase business uncertainty by drastic changes.

CHICAGO ASSOCIATION OF COMMERCE.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the statement which I had read in my time is partly typewritten matter and partly quotations from the speech of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY]. If it be printed all in one type in the RECORD it would be almost unintelligible. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the typewritten portion of the statement which was read in my time may be printed in the ordinary type of the RECORD, eight point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the typewritten portion of the statement read in his time may be printed in the ordinary type of the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, this so-called antilynching bill is one of the most drastic and most vicious measures that ever came before this body. Yet, if I thought it would stop lynchings, and at the same time prevent the awful causes of lynchings, without infringing on the rights of the States, doing violence to the Constitution, destroying the rights of our citizens, or unjustly penalizing innocent persons for the offenses of other people, I would consider giving it my support.

But I know it will not do that; it was not intended for that purpose. It is but a play to the Negro agitator for political effect, and it will not only fail to decrease the number of lynchings, or remedy the causes therefor, but it will encourage the Negro brutes in their attacks on the defenseless white women of the country. [Applause.]

As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] said, it ought to be called "A bill to encourage rape." That will be the result if it becomes the law. It will cost the lives of innocent white women and children throughout the South, if not throughout the entire country. You men from the North have never known what it means to live in a state of constant dread for the safety of your loved ones. Heretofore you have had little or no race question. But in the South it is different. The shadow of the Negro criminal constantly hangs, as Mr. GARRETT says, like the sword of Damocles over the head of every white woman in the South, and no one knows just when or where it is going to fall.

INSURING THE LIFE OF THE CRIMINAL.

The vicious Negroes will understand from this bill that they are protected in their crimes. They will see that by its terms they are assured of the protection of the Federal Government, and that if their crimes are so revolting as to invoke the wrath of an outraged community to such an extent that they rise up and take the life of the offender, then that community or county is to be fined in the sum of $10,000, to be paid to his family, no matter how atrocious his crime may have been. In other words, it insures the life of the Negro rapist for $10,000, to be paid to his family by the family and the neighbors of his victim.

Already this bill is producing results. Four assaults were committed on white women by Negro brutes during the first week of its consideration by this House. One of them took place in an apartment house in the city of Washington, right in the very shadow of the dome of this Capitol, another occurred in the State of Maryland less than 50 miles away. One occurred in Pittsburgh, Pa., and another in Hattiesburg, Miss., and how many others happened in other sections of the country God only knows.

I am not in favor of lynching, and never have been. I wish it were in my power to forever stamp it out. But there is only one way in which that can be done, and that is to remove the cause, to stop the awful crimes for which men are thus put to death. For no matter what the law is, so long as those outrages continue society will be occasionally shocked by outbreaks of mob violence. But this bill is not designed to prevent the cause of lynching, nor have its supporters uttered a single word against the commission of those horrible crimes of which lynchings are the logical results.

TYPICAL NEGRO OUTRAGES.

Several years ago a Negro brute entered a home, not very far from where I live, in which there were only two persons at the time, a mother and her daughter. The mother knew the moment she looked upon his savage countenance what his hellish designs were.

She rushed between him and his intended victim, met him at the door of her daughter's room, when he seized her, drew a razor, and cut her throat from ear to ear. She held the gaping wound with her hands and shrieked loud enough to warn her daughter to flee, and thereby saved her from a more terrible fate. When the men of that community gathered and looked upon that dead mother, who had laid down her life to save her daughter from this demon in human form, do you suppose they remained cool and collected and conducted themselves as rational men?

There has been something said in the course of this debate about the Negro that was put to death in Memphis, Tenn., two years ago. I do not know of any place where the Negroes have been treated with more consideration than they have in Memphis; nor do I know of a place where the people have done more to discountenance mob violence. Every newspaper, every minister of the gospel, and practically every other citizen had discouraged lynching in every possible way. Whenever a Negro attacked a white woman or committed some other horrible offense they said, "Let the law take its course." Things went from bad to worse, until one morning the whole community was shocked by one of the most horrible crimes ever committed by a human being.

A beautiful little girl about 13 or 14 years of age, who lived just on the outskirts of Memphis, was waylaid on her way to school by a Negro man who was more than 50 years old. He secluded himself at the only point on the road where this child had to pass out of sight of a dwelling house, and when she came along he seized her, dragged her into a secluded spot, outraged her, mutilated her little body beyond description, and then took his ax and chopped her head off, hid her head among some bushes, and then threw her little body into an old slough, and went on his way. When they captured him he confessed to the crime and told his captors where to find the remains. Is it reasonable to suppose that those people would remain cool under those circumstances?

In one town in the district which I have the honor to represent, several years ago, a little woman was standing before the mirror combing her hair, when she saw in its reflection the countenance of a black demon approaching stealthily from the rear. She knew at once what he meant. She reached and got her husband's pistol, but she was too weak to pull the trigger hard enough to make it fire. He saw from her trembling hand that she could not defend herself, and he walked up, took the weapon from her hand, choked her to insensibility, outraged her, and then took a razor, cut her throat, and left her weltering in her own blood in the parlor of her own home. I wonder what would have happened if this had occurred in your community. This was a married Negro, and when he went home he told his wife what he had done. A few days later he gave her a beating, and she told on him. He confessed, told just how he had committed the crime and where the razor and the pistol were to be found. What if this had been in East St. Louis? They would possibly be killing Negroes yet. [Laughter.]

I relate these three instances as illustrations of the conduct you are encouraging on the part of the criminal element of the Negro race by this iniquitous bill, and some of you by more iniquitous arguments.

YOUR TIME IS COMING.

You will say that these are isolated cases. But I can recall a large number of them that are just as revolting as these. A vast number of innocent white women are outraged by Negroes in the South every year, and now this evil is creeping into the North. Your time is coming; the Negroes are migrating to the North, and the day is not far distant when you will awake to a realization of the fact that you have a more serious race problem on your hands than the South has on hers.

I shall not attempt to discuss the constitutionality of this bill. That has already been done by some of the ablest lawyers in the House, and they have established its unconstitutionality beyond question. But what does the Constitution amount to with the demagogue who is bidding for Negro votes?

You will probably pass this measure, regardless of its unconstitutionality, but I want to warn you now that you are not dealing with a momentary question or tampering with any trivial affair. This is one phase of the greatest issue that ever confronted the American people—the eternal race question. Upon its proper solution may depend the peace, the happiness, the prosperity of the American people for all time to come. Upon its ultimate outcome may depend the destiny of this Republic. Upon its consequences may depend the life of American civilization.

It is an issue that is as old as man himself. Its history may be traced in the records of those nations whose monuments mark the path of time. For thousands of years it has arisen to vex the minds of statesmen and mar the progress of the human race.

It is the evil genius of our civilization, the sprig of poison ivy in the laurel wreath that crowns America's wonderful achievements.

It rent this Republic in civil feuds and drenched her soil in fraternal blood, and has kept our people divided by partisan strife and sectional feelings for more than a hundred years.

It constitutes the death's-head at the feast of international disarmament. Its sinister gaze is falling with slant-eyed racial envy upon the fairest portion of the Pacific coast, disturbing the tranquility of that great section, and has frightened the party in power into an almost ignominiously prodigal program of naval and military expenditures.

It is the greatest question of the age.

ONLY FOUR POSSIBLE SOLUTIONS.

It is one, Mr. Chairman, which will permit of only four possible solutions—amalgamation, extermination, deportation, and segregation.

Those four propositions cover all the ground and fill all the space. We must inevitably resort to one of them to arrive at a settlement. Which one shall it be?

AMALGAMATION.

Amalgamation, which means the intermarriage and intermixture of the two races, is too repulsive even for consideration. God forbid that the line of cleavage between the white man and the Negro in this country should ever be broken down! If it should be, then America, once proud America, would soon find herself sinking hopelessly into the implacable mire of mongrelism. She would drop from her exalted position as a world power, her boasted civilization would disappear, and she would ultimately become the vassal province of some civilized State.

NEGRO NOT THE EQUAL OF THE WHITE MAN.

The Negro is not the equal of the white man, and he never will be. It is just as impossible to reverse the laws of nature by acts of this Congress and lift the Negro through tens of thousands of years of civilization, education, and development, regenerate him, purge him of his weaknesses and his instincts, and endow him with Caucasian strength, traits, and characteristics, and make him the peer of the white man, as it would be to raise to the level of intelligent, patriotic statesmanship the misguided, fanatical, Negro-pandering demagogue who is always stirring this question up and advocating Negro equality.

Amalgamation is out of the question. If the white men of this country are not willing to take a permanent stand against such an evil, thank God, the white women of the Nation, the guardians of our racial purity, will take such a stand and maintain it against all odds.

We people in the South are not fighting this battle alone. But even if we were, you could never force Negro equality or Negro domination upon us, so long as the sun shines. As was once said by the immortal Henry W. Grady, we wrested that section from Negro rule when Federal drumbeats rolled nearer and Federal bayonets hedged closer about the ballot box of the South than it ever will again in this free Republic. [Applause.]

As time has passed away, the forces of white supremacy have been recruited by the additions of millions of the sober-minded patriotic men of the North, the East, and the West. The recent war taught the young men of those sections what the Negro really is, and you will find that a vast majority of those men who served in the rank and file of the American Army during that conflict and were subjected to contact with the Negro and had innumerable indignities imposed upon them and their comrades as a result of that contact—you will find that those boys are unqualifiedly in favor of maintaining white supremacy at all times and at all costs. Not only that, but the millions of white women who have been compelled to endure in silence this Negro scourge have been given the right to register their protests at the polls, and they are going to forever set the seal of their eternal condemnation upon those men who, as one woman recently expressed it, "attempt to foist this benign evil upon a thoughtless public." The white women of the North resent contact with the Negro almost or quite as much as do the white women of the South. I have seen them right here in this city, the wives of the very Congressmen who expect to vote for this iniquitous measure—I have seen the expressions of indignation and righteous resentment on their faces as they were trampled upon and pushed aside by the brutal Negroes in the street cars of Washington. The white women of the country are the ones who as a rule have suffered the indignities as a result of your misguided policy toward the Negro, and they are going to manifest their protest hereafter in no uncertain terms.

What has the Negro done for himself or for civilization to entitle him to equality with the white race? The only civilization he has ever imbibed was that imposed upon him by the white people of the South through the unfortunate institution of slavery—unfortunate for the white man; fortunate for the Negro.

For tens of thousands of years he roamed at will over the continent of Africa, the richest country of all the world, feasting upon his fellow man, and never even developed the art of agriculture to the extent of making his living out of the ground.

For countless ages he trod the sands of his native soil with diamonds beneath his feet and never even dreamed of the theory of values.

He saw the dawn of civilization and watched the pageant of the centuries pass without so much as manifesting a desire to participate in the progress.

He bowed beneath his master's whip at the building of the pyramids and watched succeeding civilizations rise and fall, and all he ever learned was to construct a rude shelter of bark and grass sufficient to shield his head from the beating rays of a tropical sun.

He remained in this savage state until he was brought to our shores and shown the light of civilization through the institution of slavery—the worst curse that ever befell the South, and the greatest blessing the Negro has ever known.

From the standpoint of the white man, slavery was a grievous fault, and grievously has Dixie answered it. For more than 50 years she has passed through the darkest shadow that ever fell across the white man's path. But, thank God, the light is at last beginning to break through the rifting clouds, and the South is rising like the phoenix from the ashes of her own destruction, the richest domain of this great Republic, and the greatest bulwark of Anglo-Saxon civilization on the Western Hemisphere. [Applause.]

The people of the South were not altogether responsible for the institution of slavery, nor will they pay the penalty alone. They bought those slaves from the people of the North, and the time has now come when you must join us in a proper solution of this question, or your section must pay its just reward. The agitators behind this bill, instead of aiding you in this work, or punishing the South for an offense of which she is not guilty, are merely complicating the situation, hastening your day of trouble, and commending the poisoned chalice to your own lips. The motive behind this agitation is social equality. That is what these Negro agitators want, and that they will never get, so long as our people maintain their self-respect and their sense of race pride.

A little more than a hundred years ago, the Negroes of Haiti threw off the yoke of bondage, took over the Government, and forced the white people of that country to submit to their domination. And what has been the result? The white people have disappeared, and the Negroes have lapsed into barbarism. A high-ranking officer in the Marine Corps testified before a Senate investigating committee recently, so I am reliably informed, that those savages are actually eating each other. And yet we find Members of the United States Congress, by their attitude on this bill, encouraging the Negroes in this country to rape indiscriminately the white women with whom they come in contact, and holding out to them the hope of immunity or reward.

Amalgamation is out of the question. For my part, I would rather know that our population would sink into the grave with the death of this generation, and that this continent would again become a howling wilderness, to be later settled up by the white races of other lands, than to see our people accept the Negroes on terms of social equality and our country go down to the future inhabited by a degraded mongrel race.

EXTERMINATION.

The next possible solution is extermination, which is too horrible to contemplate. It will only be resorted to if the fanaticism which this bill reflects continues to fan the flame of race hatred until the two races are driven to open warfare, as they were in East St. Louis, Chicago, and Springfield, Ill.

This agitation is not coming from the Negroes of the South. It is coming from the deluded Afro-Americans in and around Washington, Chicago, St. Louis, Boston, and other places where a few misguided people have led them to believe that they are merely sunburnt Yankees and entitled to be placed on equality with the white man.

At a recent meeting of more than 500 Negroes in this city it was stated by one of their leaders that his grievance was not against the Ku-Klux Klan but against the United States Government. He said:

The United States are the real Ku Klux, because they believe in white supremacy.

He said:

There are three ways to get even, namely, organization, boycott, and bullets. When we get money, we'll get guns.

He further said:

I serve notice on the United States Government that there is a black cloud arising from the South and South America, and a yellow cloud from back of the Ural Mountains that will unite to overthrow white supremacy. Everywhere—sentiment is rising against white supremacy.

One leading Washington Negro said at that meeting:

The white people's Government is tottering, and we must prepare our children to rule the white people.

Another one said he was "willing to lay down his life at any time to end white supremacy." That the Republican Party had made them promises they had never intended to keep. He also said the Republicans were in favor of white supremacy and urged the Negroes to vote the Socialist ticket. All of these Negroes who spoke at that meeting advocated intermarriage between the whites and blacks.

This information was given me by a newspaper reporter who attended that meeting, and he said these radical speeches were cheered to the echo by practically all the Negroes present.

This is the element of the Negro race that the advocates of this bill are consorting with and encouraging in their vicious designs. And if this feeling continues to grow, it will ultimately result in the extermination of the Negro race in America.

Understand, Mr. Chairman, this element does not comprise the great mass of the Negroes in the United States, or at least in the South. The relations between the white people and the Negroes in the South are about as pleasant as could be expected under the circumstances, and all we ask is that we be left alone. But these agitators have begun to invade that country and scatter their propaganda, as will appear from what took place in Arkansas two years ago and in Tulsa, Okla., last year.

The Negro is a tenant at sufferance wherever he comes in contact with the white man, and whenever their peaceful relations are disturbed the Negro disappears. He is no longer necessary to the economic prosperity of the South, and whenever this agitation progresses to where he is a menace to the safety of the community in which he resides he will be compelled to seek employment elsewhere. Where will he go? He will fill your northern cities, towns, and hamlets, until you will have a race problem compared with which ours in the South will shrink to insignificance. I predict that within less than 25 years from to-day some of the very districts whose Representatives are behind this bill will be crying aloud for help to rid them of this Negro scourge, and possibly be answered only by the "echo of their wailing cry."

DEPORTATION.

The next available solution is deportation, which is hardly feasible at this time, although it may be the ultimate solution. But it will be a long time, to say the least of it, before the people of this country, both white and black, will consent to a final separation. The question is before us now, and a solution less drastic must be found.

SEGREGATION.

That solution is segregation.

Segregation, or a separation of the races, is the only immediate reasonable, humane, sensible solution of this great question. We need to segregate the races not only socially but politically as well. The South has pursued this course, and compared with the number of Negroes we have there we have had comparatively few outbreaks of mob violence, such as characterized the riots in East St. Louis and other northern cities. Your figures, which were compiled by Negroes, show that Mississippi has lynched 373 people in 40 years. But you must remember that in that State we have more Negroes than whites, and we had more agitation on the part of the carpetbaggers during the days of reconstruction than almost any other State in the Union. But aside from that, our record is not half as bad as the records of some of the States whose Representatives are raising such a howl about our mistreating the "innocent" Negroes, and keeping so painfully silent about the innocent white women whom these brutes have outraged. If every one of the following 20 States had as many Negroes as Mississippi has, and had lynched as many in proportion to the number as the record shows they have lynched in the same length of time, their records, even according to the reports compiled by these Negroes, would be as follows: While Mississippi was lynching 373, Missouri would have lynched 538, Kansas 672, Minnesota 423, West Virginia 566, Iowa 674, Wisconsin 1,724, Wyoming 7,706, Washington 2,336, California 1,400, Colorado 2,199, Idaho 12,462, Illinois 1,833, Indiana 508, Montana 11,603, Nebraska 3,943, Nevada 11,877, New Mexico 10,094, North Dakota 4,924, Oregon 6,775, and South Dakota 18,694.

There ought to be a law in every State in the Union prohibiting intermarriage between the races, and they ought to be separated in all governmental activities, in the Army, in the Navy, in schools, and on street cars, railroad trains, and other common carriers. In those States where they have not enough Negroes to justify the railroads in carrying an extra coach, there ought to be a separate section set aside for them, or a separate section set aside for the white people.

There ought to be, and there must be, before this question is settled, a segregation law in every State, separating whites and Negroes in the residential sections of cities, towns, and municipalities. In the South we have done that. We are segregated by a common understanding. The Negro abides by it, for he knows it is best for himself as well as for the white man.

In the North you will be driven to this salutary recourse within the very near future, and the sooner you wake up and adopt it the better it will be for all concerned. One white woman in Indianapolis, Indiana, writing on the subject, says:

Civic organizations have sprung up all over Indianapolis formed for the purpose of self-protection against the Negro element, who are invading the white residence sections and thereby ruining the value of real estate for blocks around.

This is one of the great menaces with which you people are going to have to deal, and the longer you postpone the day of reckoning the more violent will be the readjustment, which is just as sure to come as the night follows the day.

In order to reach this solution, it may be necessary to repeal the fifteenth and modify the fourteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States or adopt a new amendment giving the States the necessary power before these changes can be brought about. If such a change in our fundamental law is necessary to reach a righteous adjustment of the overshadowing issue of the age, then let us hasten to make the change.

Mr. Chairman, I have no antipathy for the Negro as a race; I have no prejudice against him because he is a Negro. I am a far better friend to him than any man who votes for this bill. But I understand him; I know his weaknesses, his shortcomings, and his limitations. I want to see him protected in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. And in order to protect him in those enjoyments and save him from the disastrous consequences of further misunderstandings with the white people of this country, in order to protect the white people against the contamination of an inferior race, in order to perpetuate the glories of this great Republic and reunite her in the bonds of fraternal love and mutual understanding, in order that her blessings may be showered on the generations yet unborn, I implore you men of the North to join with the men of the South in the only just and equitable solution of this great problem—a segregation of the two races. [Applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SANDERS].

Mr. SANDERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the time for debate on that nefarious bill known as the antilynching bill will soon be concluded. I have listened with interest to the arguments which have been made here both for and against the bill. Those who advocate the bill base their argument on the proposition that Congress has the right to enact this legislation under that clause in the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States which provides "that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." Those of us who oppose this legislation have taken the position that this bill is unconstitutional even under that provision of the fourteenth amendment. During this discussion some very able arguments have been made against the constitutionality of this bill in which it has been clearly shown that the bill is unconstitutional. It would be unwise to enact it into law even if it was constitutional. Many cases have been cited by those opposed to this measure from the Supreme Court of the United States, among them being the United States v. Cruickshank (92 U. S. Rep., 554); the Slaughterhouse case (16 Wal., U. S., p. 81); United States v. Harris (106 West); Barbier v. Connolly (113 U. S., p. 13), in which case, the court speaking of the fourteenth amendment, said: "Neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment was designed to interfere with the powers of the States, sometimes termed its 'police powers,' to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people." It is clear that the inhibition in that particular clause of the fourteenth amendment is against the State denying the equal protection of the laws and not against the private citizens. Therefore it occurs to me that due regard for the Constitution will drive all from this part of the bill by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313), wherein the court says: "These provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively and not to any action of private individuals." In view of this decision, the advocates of this measure are left to only one proposition, Is the State responsible for the wrongful acts of its public officials? In other words, Is the State liable for the torts of its officers?

This question is well decided in the case of Billings v. State (67 Pacific Reporter, p. 583), and cases therein cited. I quote from the decision, page 585:

Touching the liability of the State for the wrongful acts of its public officials, the Supreme Court of North Carolina, in Clodfelter v. State, said "that the doctrine of respondeat superior applicable to the relations of principal and agent created between other persons does not prevail against the sovereign in the necessary employment of public agents is too well settled upon authority and practice to admit controversy."

No Government—

Says Mr. Justice Miller—

has ever held itself liable to individuals for the malfeasance, laches, or unauthorized exercise of power by its officers and agents. (Gibbons v. U. S., 8 Wall., 269.)

And Judge Story declares in his work on agency (sec. 319):

The Government does not undertake to guarantee to any person the fidelity of any of the officers or agents whom it employs, since that would involve it in all its operations in endless embarrassments and difficulties and losses, which would be subversive of the public interests.

The language of Judge Story, quoted in the Clodfelter case above cited, is also quoted and approved by Mr. Justice Miller in Gibbons against United States. It is further stated in the opinion of the court in Gibbons against United States that—

The general principle which we have already stated as applicable to all Governments forbids, on a policy imposed by necessity, that they should hold themselves liable for the unauthorized wrongs inflicted by their officers on the citizen, though occurring while engaged in the discharge of official duties.

The constitution of the State of Tennessee provided that "suits may be brought against the State in such manner and in such courts as the legislature may by law direct." In determining the scope and effect of those provisions, the supreme court of that State, in Clark against State, expressed its view upon the subject as follows:

The constitutional and statutory provisions provide a remedy for any existing course of action, but do not change the relation between the State and the citizen so as to create any liability or responsibility on the part of the State. The relation of the State to the citizen is not one of contract which implies an undertaking upon good consideration on the part of the State that all the functions of government shall be duly performed, or that it will employ none but capable and faithful agents. If an officer or agent of the State commits an act to the injury of the citizen, it is an act beyond the scope of his agency, unauthorized by his principal, and the State is not liable therefor to the party injured.

This case is plain and direct in point and ought to satisfy the most skeptical, barring the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANSORGE], who wants to put it up to the Supreme Court anyway and make it repeat what it has already said, and then when it says it again he proposed to get a constitutional amendment; and the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANSORGE] will have as much difficulty in getting the people of the United States to adopt a constitutional amendment of that kind as he will have in getting passed the bill which he has introduced in this Congress which ought to be styled a bill to lynch the farmers, as he provides in said bill—H. R. 9666—to punish by fine not exceeding $5,000 "every person, whether a Member of Congress or otherwise, who shall engage in any such 'bloc,' and so forth. And also barring another gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who wants the bill passed because some Negroes were drafted in the war, and who says that he—fails to follow the logic or the political tactics of my Republican colleagues who try to pretend that this legislation is not aimed at special sections of the South.

And there you are. We have been contending that this is urged here as a sectional matter, and some of the Republican Members have denied it, and now comes the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] and gives the secret away. However, I am persuaded that the bill, though unconstitutional, will pass, because the Republicans have made it a party issue and a sectional issue, and when blind partisanship is given unbridled reign one had as well shoot skyrockets into hell for the purposes of illumination as to further argue on the unconstitutionality of the bill. The passage of this bill will reflect no credit upon the administration. Whatever glory they get out of it, they are welcome to it. This bill will yet arise to plague the Republican Party. As stated by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], it is not only unconstitutional but some of its provisions "are immoral." Wrongdoing in political as well as in personal life is always followed with proper punishment. The Constitution of the United States was framed, not as a temporary matter, but for all time, and the problems of the South may yet become the problems of the North. Owing to economic and other conditions the Negroes are now drifting from the South to the North. No one defends lynching. We all believe in law and order, and that all crimes should be dealt with under the legal and orderly processes of government, and each of the States of the Union already has laws under which the crime of lynching may be punished, and this bill is the most dastardly invasion of State rights ever proposed in the American Congress. But not only have the States laws under which the crime of lynching may be punished but there is now ample provision in the Federal laws.

I have reference to sections 5508 and 5509 of the United States Statutes. Therefore this whole legislation is unnecessary, even if it were constitutional, and it becomes more evident that the bill was brought in for political effect and to cinch the Negro vote for the Republican Party. This purpose perhaps the bill will accomplish, but at the same time it will drive from the Republican Party thousands of white men and more white women who do not believe in social equality, who know that the white race is the superior race, and who know that the white race will now, as it has always done, dominate and control wherever it goes. If the Congress has the power to pass this bill, then it has the power to pass a law against all other penal offenses, including crap shooting. All powers not delegated to the Federal Government were reserved to the States, and recognition of the reserved rights of the States and the jurisdiction of the States over matters retained by them is essential to the successful operation of our system of government, and the further we remove power from the people the less interest will they feel in their responsibility as citizens. Common sense, reason, and judgment suggest that this bill is unconstitutional. It has been said that "law is the perfection of reason; it always intends to conform thereto, and that which is not reason is not law."

Section 2 of this bill provides "that if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage, such State shall be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State." That is an unreasonable and ridiculous provision. Under that provision the sheriff of any county might use every effort within his power to protect a prisoner from a mob, even giving his life in defense of the prisoner, and then if his efforts "failed," in the language of that provision, it would be deemed a denial to the prisoner of the equal protection of the law, and the county in which the lynching occurred would have to pay $10,000. I can not understand the workings of a man's mind who can persuade himself that that is reasonable or common sense. Section 3 of the bill provides—that an officer who fails to use all reasonable efforts to prevent such person from being put to death shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years or by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both such fine and imprisonment.

What is "all reasonable efforts" anyway in contemplation of this insane passage? Who would have the office of sheriff with such a law as that hanging over him? It seems that the idea is to make the bill so drastic as to do away altogether with the officers of the State.

Section 5 of the bill provides:

That in any county where a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage such county shall forfeit $10,000, which may be recovered for the use of the family, if any, of the person put to death; if he had no family, then to his dependent parents, if any; otherwise for the use of the United States.

While section 6 provides:

That in the event any person so put to death shall have been transported by such mob from one county to another during the time intervening between his capture and putting to death, each county in or through which he may have been transported shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture herein provided.

Under these provisions a horrible crime might be committed in one county and a mob might seize the perpetrator of the crime and carry him in the dead hours of night across the county line into another county and put him to death, and notwithstanding the fact that not a person in the county where the lynching occurs knows anything about the crime or the lynching, such county must pay $10,000. This proposition is so ridiculous that it is useless to argue it. It destroys itself. Like vice, "to be hated," it needs "only to be seen." The incorporation of such provisions in the bill only demonstrates the depths of nonsense the infirmities of human nature will permit one to go. Taking the bill as a whole and considering that it was framed by man, I am wondering if Shakespeare was not looking down the corridors of time when he said, "That in the great drama of life man plays many parts." Some days ago a veteran newspaper man in my district made some observations on this bill, and I now submit them. This editorial is from the Rusk County News:

AN IGNOMINIOUS BILL.

The most ignominious bill since the force bill is the measure introduced in Congress to transfer mob cases to the Federal courts and to impose penalties upon the counties in which mobs may take place. In this way Congress seeks to punish the innocent for the crimes of the guilty. No measure has ever been introduced in any legislative body in America that will, should it become a law, arouse the passions and race hatred to the extent of a law so foreign to justice and the impeachment of the principles that constitute the very foundation of this Government as this bill proposes to do. We have a law in every State for the punishment of mobs, and no one is pleading for a mitigation of the rigor of that law. We have laws for the punishment of murder, robbery, theft, and on down the line, including crime of every nature, and those laws are being violated daily. But the machinery for the punishment of those crimes is as perfect as human ingenuity and human wisdom can devise. What is the motive of singling out this crime and providing for its punishment by measures that would bring reproach and humiliation upon all the people of a section? It has its origin in the prejudices, passions, and hatred of a political faction which has never ceased to harrass and disturb the domestic affairs of a people who for more than 50 years have had to deal with the most delicate race problem of this or any other nation. In their fanatical zeal for a race over which they assume moral and political custodianship they would by this un-American bill destroy the last tie between the whites and the blacks of the South and create a condition that would be inconceivably hazardous for the peace and happiness of both races and make it difficult for the Negro ever to get justice in any court, either Federal or State. History furnishes no instance where legislation was enacted for the purpose of venting spleen and spite, legislation incompatible with the principles of right and justice, that it did not create an upright resistance, often resulting in war and revolution. This proposed law, so subversive of every principle of justice and good government, would array the people of the South against all the Negroes as a race, where formerly only the criminal was the object of vengeance, and it would ere long result in a condition that would make it intolerable for the two races to exist in the same country. This very thing which causes mobs has made it impossible for the Negroes to live in certain counties in the South, and if that bill is to become a law the feeling will soon become so intense over the dread of a whole county becoming involved in a Federal court and the fear of a county's property being confiscated to pay fines resulting from a crime back of the mob—the most atrocious of all crimes—that a separation of the two races will be imperative. On no hypothesis can the law be defended. The most bigoted idolizers of the Hamiltonian theory of government never dreamed of legislation half so vicious as this so-called anti-mob bill.

It would require but one case in which a lot of white men charged with mobbing a Negro for outraging a white woman under a law such as this to precipitate a clash. White men of the South will never stand for the confiscation of their property to pay to keep up a family, white or black, on account of the head of the family committing the blackest of all crimes. And rather than submit to a system which at any day might bring upon the law-abiding taxpayers a tyranny never approached in this country since the rebellion of our forefathers against the long list of unjust exactions imposed upon them by a soulless monarchy 3,000 miles away they will as the first step warn all Negroes that they must leave. There is not an intelligent, sensible Negro in all the South who will favor this law. All the good Negroes want is protection, and they know that as long as they obey the laws they are certain of that protection. They abhor the thought of a law that would molest them in their peaceful relations with the white people. They have sense enough to know that a law that will force the people charged with mobbing a man for a crime worse than murder away from home and tried in a Federal court will engender a state of feeling between the two races that will make it intolerable and impossible for them to live together. They know that a law of that kind would mean the deportation of the Negroes from the South. And they also know that their true friends are in the South; and these politicians of the North, who seem so solicitous of their welfare, are of all men the least concerned when it comes to legislation that will really give them relief from the infamous taxes that are imposed on all of us alike.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

THE SHANTUNG QUESTION.

Mr. WALSH of Montana submitted a resolution (S. Res. 221), which was read as follows:

Whereas in an ultimatum dispatched by the Emperor of Japan to the Imperial German Government on August 15, 1914, which marks the entrance of the eastern empire in the World War, it is stated: "We consider it highly important and necessary in the present situation to take measures to remove the causes of all disturbance of the peace in the Far East. The Imperial Japanese Government sincerely believes it to be its duty to give advice to the Imperial German Government to carry out the following two propositions: First, to withdraw immediately from Japanese and Chinese waters the German men-of-war and armed vessels of all kinds; second, to deliver on a date not later than September 15 to the Imperial Japanese authorities, without condition or compensation, the entire leased territory of Kiaochow, with a view to the eventual restoration of the same to China"; and

Whereas on May 6, 1915, after the conquest of Shantung had been consummated by an Anglo-Japanese expeditionary force and the Japanese Army was in possession of Shantung districts greatly exceeding in extent the leased territory referred to in the ultimatum, the Secretary of State of the United States addressed to the Governments of Japan and China the following identic notes: "In view of the circumstances of the negotiations which have taken place or which are now pending between the Governments of China and of Japan and the agreements which have been reached as a result thereof, the Government of the United States has the honor to notify the Government of the Chinese Republic that it can not recognize any agreement or undertaking which has been entered into between the Governments of China and Japan impairing the treaty rights of the United States and its citizens in China, the political or territorial integrity of the Republic of China, or the international policy commonly known as the open-door policy"; an identical note being at the same time handed to the Japanese Government by the American embassy in Tokio; and

Whereas on August 24, 1915, Count Okuma, prime minister of Japan, cabled the American press the following message: "As premier of Japan I have stated, and I now again state to the people of America and of the world, that Japan has no desire to secure more territory, no thought of depriving China or any other peoples of anything which they now possess"; and

Whereas in October, 1919, the majority party of the United States Senate recorded its disapproval of the Shantung award and adopted the following reservation to the treaty of Versailles known as the Lodge amendment, from the fact that it was drawn up and presented by the Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, one of the Members of this body now serving with the American delegation to the conference, which reads: "The United States withholds its assent to articles 156, 157, 158, and reserves full liberty of action with respect to any controversy which may arise under said articles between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan"; and

Whereas in the course of the same debate the minority party of the Senate voted for a reservation to the treaty whose ratification they advocated which, offered by the Hon. KEY PITTMAN, a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, provided "That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands that the German rights and interests renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty, as provided in the exchanged notes between the Japanese and Chinese Governments under date of May 25, 1915"; and

Whereas on July 1, 1921, the Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State, addressed a note to the Hon. Alfred Sze, Chinese minister to the United States, in which he stated the position of the American Government in the following terms: "The Government of the United States never has associated itself with any arrangement which sought to establish any special rights in China which would abridge the rights of the subjects or citizens of other friendly States; and I am happy to assure you that it is the purpose of this Government neither to participate in nor to acquiesce in any arrangement which might purport to establish in favor of foreign interests a superiority of rights with respect to commercial and economic development in designated regions of the territories of China"; and

Whereas the text of the invitation sent to the Government of China by the President of the United States under date of August 11, 1921, reads: "It is quite clear that there can be no final assurance of the peace of the world in the absence of the desire for peace, and the prospect of reduced armament is not a hopeful one unless this desire finds expression in a practical effort to remove causes of misunderstanding and to seek ground for agreement as to principles and their application. It is the earnest wish of this Government that through an interchange of views with the facilities afforded by a conference it may be possible to find a solution of Pacific and Far Eastern problems of unquestioned importance at this time"; and

Whereas the Hon. Charles Evans Hughes, Secretary of State, has in the course of his correspondence with Japan and the other powers signatories of the treaty of Versailles declared "There would be no valid or effective disposition of the overseas possessions of Germany now under consideration without the assent of the United States"; and

Whereas the arms conference, at which Far Eastern problems were to be discussed, has been assembled in the city of Washington since November 12 of last year, and although no plenary public sessions of the conference have been held since December 10, 1921, it is officially communicated that the Shantung retrocession has not been officially discussed, although informal conversations have from time to time been pursued by the Chinese and the Japanese plenipotentiaries, hitherto without result, as to the manner of restoring the occupied territory to its rightful owners in accordance with the terms of the Japanese declaration of war upon Germany; and

Whereas it is contemplated in the so-called four-power pact about to be submitted for ratification that controversies likely to give rise to war affecting the insular possessions or dominions of the powers signatory thereto in the Pacific shall be composed, if possible, by conferences between them; and

Whereas the said powers are all now represented at the said arms conference in session in the city of Washington: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the United States Senate, if it is not incompatible with the public interest, what steps, if any, have been taken to give effect in substance as well as in form to the foregoing declarations and policies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, do I understand that any request was made for action on the resolution?

Mr. LODGE. Such request was not made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was no such request made, but the Chair referred the resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations because the Chair believed that that was the proper committee to consider the resolution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I ask that the resolution may go over under the rule for the day, that it be printed, and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Montana asks that the resolution lie over for one day. Therefore the order of reference will be rescinded, and the resolution will lie on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the resolution also be printed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie on the table for a day and will be printed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I shall be glad to say a word now about the resolution which has been offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], which has gone over until to-morrow. The reason why I do not defer my remarks until to-morrow is because I am not sure that I shall then be present.

As I heard it read from the desk, the resolution recites the facts, so far as this country is concerned, in reference to its attitude concerning the occupation of Shantung by the Japanese Government after the territory was taken by force of arms from the Germans.

I wish to say that under the administration of Mr. Wilson and under the administration of President Harding our country has occupied a position in reference to this matter that can not be controverted. We have contended from the beginning that this territory of a right was the territory of China, and have offered our good offices on all occasions to try to secure the return of that territory to China.

The attitude of the American delegation at the conference now being held in Washington has been exactly in accord with the representations made by the Government of President Wilson and the Government of President Harding. The question has not been directly before the conference, and manifestly it can not come before the conference until it is settled between the Governments of China and Japan, because seven of the powers sitting in the conference are signatory to the treaty of Versailles, and, of course, can not deny the conclusions reached in that treaty with reference to this territory until an agreement is reached between China and Japan. Therefore, seven of the powers are unable to discuss the question as between Japan and China because they have already committed themselves by treaty.

It can not be taken up directly in the conference, but for many weeks the matter has been pending between the Governments of China and Japan in a conference of their delegates in Washington, and, although the American Government is not directly concerned and can not be directly concerned in that conference, the good offices of our Government have been exerted and the earnest desire of the American delegates to the conference has been constantly manifested in favor of working out an agreement by which the sovereignty of Shantung shall be returned to the Republic of China, and its territorial integrity preserved. A settlement has not as yet been reached, but the deliberations are now approaching very close to a settlement; and from the information I have I am hopeful that at a very early date a satisfactory settlement will be arrived at. As to the resolution, of course there can be no objection to calling on the President for the facts. On the other hand, the facts as existing to-day, outside of those recited in the resolution, which are historically correct, are resting in a negotiation between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan.

I say this only because I am heartily in accord with the desire and sentiment expressed in the resolution offered by the Senator from Montana. I know that his purpose is to aid in accomplishing a result that will be beneficial to the Republic of China; and as I probably shall not be here in the morning when the resolution comes up for discussion, I wanted to make clear my attitude in reference to the matter and the attitude of the American delegates so far as this matter is concerned.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, it is my judgment that in all probability the purpose I had in introducing this resolution would not be forwarded by any protracted discussion of it in the Senate. I hoped that it would be promptly adopted by the Senate without any debate whatever. I know how likely discussions of these matters are to complicate and to make more difficult the problem that is before us; but I desire simply to say, in this connection, that I offered the resolution because it is currently reported that the conference now in session in this city is about to break up. Indeed, some time ago assurances were given that its work would be completed by the 15th of January. A later estimate says that the conference will be over by the 1st of February. One of its accomplishments is what is known as the four-power pact, which requires the Government of the United States, should it be ratified by the Senate, to participate in the adjustment and settlement of any of these controversies which unhappily exist between powerful nations in the Orient, and which might lead to war involving the insular possessions or dominions of any of the powers.

That a war between any of these powers would necessarily involve the insular possessions and dominions, no one can question; and, accordingly, it would then be necessary to assemble a conference of these four powers for the purpose of canvassing the various questions and disposing of them in an amicable way, if that result could be arrived at. These controversies do exist. They may eventually result in war. The powers joining in the four-power pact are now represented here, so that it would seem that this is the opportune time to take up these matters and endeavor to arrive at some composition of them.

I am very happy to be assured by the Senator from Alabama that there is an immediate prospect of their being amicably adjusted; but it can be very well understood that there would be great hesitancy upon the part of the Senate in ratifying a treaty which would involve us in any way in the controversies that even now arise, and if they can be settled at the present time it would seem rather hopeless to look for a settlement of them at some future time when the powers shall assemble in accordance with the provisions of the four-power pact.

I did not desire to say anything further in connection with the matter, except to explain my purpose in offering the resolution.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I want to say that I am in thorough accord with what the Senator has said. I feel that this is one of the most important questions from our standpoint that is here—I will not say before the Conference for the Limitation of Armament, because necessarily the question is not directly before the conference, for the reason that seven of the powers are committed by the treaty, and the matter must be worked out between the Republic of China and the Empire of Japan before the conference can do anything. If they can reach an agreement, then the other powers can come in and ratify it and stand upon it. I think one of the things that is delaying final action of the conference right now is the hope that the Shantung question will be settled, and that an agreement can be reached between China and Japan and ratified before the conference adjourns. That is one of the causes of delay.

I realize that it is true, as the Senator says, that if a settlement can be reached as to the issue in reference to Shantung it will have a very favorable effect on the other treaties that will be presented to the Senate, both in the country and in the Senate, and that it undoubtedly would be regarded as unfortunate if the conference were to adjourn without a settlement of this problem. As I have said, however, the problem is not before the conference; it can not be before the conference; and I can give my assurance to the Senator and the Senate that so far as the American delegation are concerned they are using every effort they legitimately and properly can to bring about a settlement along the lines suggested by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama has explained very fully and very accurately the exact situation. I only desire to say this in addition:

The attention of the American delegation and of the conference has been given to China and the questions involving China from the beginning, and the members of the conference have been working upon that subject in committee very steadily. Resolutions have been adopted and many points settled affecting China which will be extremely helpful to her; and those resolutions in regard to the integrity of China, both administrative and political, undoubtedly will be embodied in a treaty which will come before the Senate for ratification.

The difficulty with Shantung is that which the Senator from Alabama has pointed out: It is something with which the conference can not deal directly, because seven of the powers sitting at the table are signers of the treaty of Versailles, and would be obliged to adhere to their signatures and to their agreements in regard to the Shantung paragraph, which forms part of that treaty. What we all earnestly desire, and the purpose which the American delegation has had greatly at heart—that is, the settlement of Shantung, which is the most important question relating to China—can be reached only through negotiations between China and Japan. The good offices of the United States have been employed to bring about a settlement in that way; and, as the Senator from Alabama has said, it is the Shantung question which has caused most of the delay which we all find so unsatisfactory.

I do not suppose that all of the details of the negotiations between China and Japan have yet been laid before the President. I can only assure the Senator from Montana and the Senate that I feel, and the whole American delegation feels, just exactly as he does in regard to the importance of Shantung, and there is nothing that we have more at heart than the settlement of that question. We have been taking the only course we could toward its settlement. I hope it will not be necessary to debate the question in detail until the conference has concluded its work, and until we know, as I hope we shall know very soon, what we may expect from the negotiations between China and Japan.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. The question is asked in order that there may be, as the Senator suggests, no debate upon this question until the conference has finally agreed upon its work.

Is the one insuperable obstacle to consideration by the conference of the Shantung matter, for instance, the Versailles treaty?

Mr. LODGE. The insuperable obstacle to taking the Shantung question before the conference is the fact that seven of the powers are already bound by the settlement of Versailles. Nothing would be done if it went before the conference.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does that apply to every determination that may have been made in the Versailles treaty—that the conference can not consider anything that has been agreed upon in the Versailles treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Oh, that has not been suggested at all. As a matter of fact, this is the only question as to which they are bound if it is forced upon them.

Mr. JOHNSON. They are only bound if they want to be, are they not?

Mr. LODGE. I take it that the seven powers that have signed the Versailles treaty would hesitate to break it if Japan appealed to them to stand by their signatures.

Mr. JOHNSON. They have the ability, of course, to consider the proposition; but they feel, as I understand, that because there has been a determination at Versailles they can not act in the matter until Japan shall have consented.

Mr. LODGE. We can act, and China can act, of course.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood the position was that you could not act until——

Mr. LODGE. I do not say we can not act.

Mr. JOHNSON. I speak of the conference, in using the pronoun. The conference can not act until Japan agrees?

Mr. LODGE. If Japan takes a stand on the agreement of the Versailles conference, there are six other powers which are bound, of course, by the Versailles treaty.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do those six powers take the attitude that they can do nothing unless Japan agrees; or is that the attitude our delegates take?

Mr. LODGE. I have assumed that if it was brought into a plenary conference, an open conference, that would be the end of the Shantung question, because you can not have an agreement in the conference unless the conference agrees; it is not a matter of votes. Every power must agree in an international conference, and there are seven already bound on this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not want to be persistent or to continue to ask the Senator questions; the Senator has answered my question. But are we assuming that they desire to be bound, or do they take the position that they are bound, and will not consider an injustice that was done? That is the point of my inquiry.

Mr. LODGE. It is not for me to comment on their motives, or anything of that sort. I can only say if that question came up, there are six powers at least that can not, without breaking a treaty which they have signed, undertake to act.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a perfectly logical conclusion of the Senator, of course; but in the light of what has transpired since the execution of the Versailles treaty, and because of the admitted fact of the wrong that was done China by that instrument, perhaps, if it were brought to the attention of these signatory powers, they might not raise the objection which the Senator is suggesting.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am very anxious to have Japan give up Shantung.

Mr. JOHNSON. I know that.

Mr. LODGE. I stand on the reservation which I offered in the Senate. My own judgment is that if a plenary conference is called upon to act upon that question without the assent of China and Japan, nothing will be done and Shantung will remain with Japan.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit a suggestion right there?

Mr. LODGE. Certanly.

Mr. KING. I venture to suggest that the matter has already been alluded to from time to time; that the seven powers, including Japan, having signed the Versailles treaty, and there being instrumentalities provided in the treaty for adjusting controversies which may arise, I feel that the matter to which the Senator from California has alluded may properly be brought before the tribunals of the League of Nations for adjudication, and I have no doubt that steps will be taken, if the matter is not adjusted here, to bring it before the tribunals to which I have referred.

Mr. BORAH. Suppose the matters were before the League of Nations; in how much better condition would they be?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly the question, Mr. President. The situation would be presented that is presented by the Senator from Massachusetts. The signatory powers could not act, if it were brought before the league, any more than they could act now. If the reasoning be valid in the one instance, it is equally valid in the other.

Mr. KING. I do not want to intrude upon the Senator, but I do not assent at all to the position taken by the Senator from California. The machinery is provided by the League of Nations, and the organization of the League of Nations permits that matter to be brought up, and those who are bound by the treaty would aid in bringing the matter before the proper tribunal set up by the League of Nations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. LODGE. I yield first to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I was going to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if it was not perfectly evident, so as to admit of no argument, that if these seven powers have signed an agreement contained in the treaty of Versailles, that agreement can not be modified except by unanimous consent of all the signatories?

Mr. LODGE. Only by the treaty of Versailles?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; if seven powers have signed an agreement, a treaty at Versailles or elsewhere, that agreement can not be modified except by the unanimous consent of the parties who signed it.

Mr. LODGE. It can not be done, of course, unless Japan, one of the signatories, agrees to it.

Mr. BORAH. That would be true inside of the league, just the same as out of it.

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely.

Mr. BORAH. There is no necromantic power in the League of Nations which enables it to change treaties.

Mr. LODGE. None.

Mr. BORAH. Then you must have the consent of the signers the same as if there were no league. It has no powers to modify treaties.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will allow me to say one word, because this question is one we are very earnest about, and it is very important in world affairs, and is just approaching a settlement. Any delegation or governmental instrumentality which tried right now to throw this question into a plenary session, and force somebody's hand, would be throwing a monkey wrench into a piece of machinery which might affect the world very seriously, whereas I think if it is let alone for a short time it will work itself out fairly satisfactorily; at least, I have every reason to hope that it will and that a fairly reasonable settlement can be arrived at.

Mr. LODGE. That is the exact state of the case. The only method of bringing about a settlement of the Shantung question is that adopted, and I have very strong hopes, which I share with the Senator from Alabama, that this question, which has been long discussed between Japan and China, will be settled in a way which will be very satisfactory to the people of the United States. I do not think anything can be done now outside that will advance it.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the amendment now before the Senate is that respecting the Undersecretary of the Treasury Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the first amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations, on page 2, beginning in line 2, after the numerals "$12,000," to insert:

> Undersecretary of the Treasury, to be nominated by the President and appointed by him, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall receive compensation at the rate of $7,500 per annum and shall perform such duties in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury as may be prescribed by the Secretary or by law, and under the provisions of section 177, Revised Statutes, in case of the death, resignation, absence, or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall perform the duties of the Secretary until a successor is appointed or such absence or sickness shall cease, $7,500.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the committee, if he will not accept an amendment in lines 2 and 3 on page 2, striking out the words "Undersecretary of the Treasury" and substituting therefor the words "First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury."?

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that that would involve a difficulty when we go into conference. As we have it now, it has already been provided by law, and it was put in in the House in that form, and if we should change it to the other phraseology it would make a complete change.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is precisely what I want to do; I wish to change the law. The Senator realizes that for the first 130 years of our history we were content, when we needed an assistant secretary of any department, to so describe him; but recently it seems to have gotten to be very popular to ape the nomenclature of a foreign country, substituting its terms in matters of offices for those we have stood by so long, and I do not think this change is a proper one.

I think we ought to stick to our well-known nomenclature in regard to officers, and I hope the Senator will accept my amendment; but I believe he has said he does not care to do so, and I offer the amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. OVERMAN. I agree entirely with the Senator from Tennessee. I have fought this proposition for a good many years, and the statute passed by Congress which provided for it should never have been passed. This appropriation bill is only carrying out the law. I suggest to the Senator that if he introduces a separate bill, carrying out the idea he has in mind, I will help him to try to have it enacted into law.

This is an important subject. The first thing you know we will have an Undersecretary of Agriculture and undersecretaries in all the departments. This was only started to ape England when we passed the law providing for the Undersecretary of State, which I was opposed to at the time. Now we come to an Undersecretary of the Treasury, and I am opposed to that; but the law says there shall be such an office, and a salary has been provided for it. The way to change it is to amend the law, and I will help the Senator to get such an amendment through.

Mr. McKELLAR. What would be the effect if we should provide in this bill for a First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and fix his compensation at $7,500?

Mr. OVERMAN. I wish we could do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. That would by law repeal the former act, and we ought to repeal it.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think we ought to repeal it, but how are you going to repeal it that way?

Mr. McKELLAR. The only way that we can repeal it that I know of is in an appropriation bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. It would be in order to repeal it on this bill if the Senator from Wyoming would not object.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is unquestionably in order if the Senate will adopt it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is subject to a point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. No one has raised the point of order, and I hope it will not be raised.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask the Senator from Tennessee, if he has investigated it, whether the office of Undersecretary of the Treasury is established by existing law? Is there any law providing for such an office?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not examined it. The chairman of the committee can tell us if that is the case, but it is my recollection that it was simply put into an appropriation bill precisely as this is about to be put in an appropriation bill.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The purpose I had in asking the question was to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that it seems to me if there is no law establishing this office, then this amendment in an appropriation bill is subject to a point of order. I think the amendment in substance, probably, providing for some official there to perform these duties, is a meritorious one, and that this official is very much needed; but I am very much in sympathy with the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee as to the absurdity of the United States abandoning our long-established precedents as to the titles of our officials and copying after any foreign country, when there is no more substantial reason for it than has been suggested here. It is very much in line, I may say, with the propaganda, strange as it may seem that there is propaganda, to abolish the singing of the Star-Spangled Banner in the United States, because it is said it might be offensive to some foreign countries; and that applies to many other movements of that kind. I am very much in sympathy with the Senator's statement, but I suggest to him that it might be subject to a point of order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to correct what I said before. I thought this office had been provided for by law.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator was mistaken.

Mr. OVERMAN. After going into it I find it was provided for on a deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was done on an appropriation bill, such as we have before us now.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator is correct. I have found out about it. I merely wanted to correct the statement I made a little while ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am obliged to the Senator. I wish to say, Mr. President, that I have no objection in the world to this office being created for the very excellent gentleman who is now holding it. Mr. Gilbert is one of the most efficient men in the Government service, I think, and I do not want to be put in the attitude of objecting on his account, but as an American I am objecting to this seeming aping of a foreign country in giving titles to our officials. It means nothing. It is just a silly proposition, in my judgment, one which ought not to be countenanced for a moment.

So far as the particular office is concerned, I would prefer, being an American, to be First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury to being Undersecretary of the Treasury. It may be that the name "Undersecretary" may carry some dignity with it in the minds of some people, but in the minds of the great body of the American people I believe it would not. We know what the duties of the office are, and it should be designated as we have done in the past.

Therefore, Mr. President, I move as an amendment, in lines 2 and 3, on page 2, to strike out "Undersecretary of the Treasury" and to substitute therefor "First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he is entirely mistaken when he supposes this is only an aping of a foreign country, and is meaningless. It is not meaningless at all. It is the creation of a new office. It is giving a new position. It is providing for an additional office in the Treasury Department, and I think it is altogether wrong. I believe we ought to confine these designations so that we will not have an additional office to those already in existence in that department.

Mr. McKELLAR. As I stated before, whether it is a new office or an old office, I have no objection to the payment of $7,500 to Mr. Gilbert, who is at present holding this office, whatever its name may be. I have no objection to that; but I do object to his being called "Undersecretary of the Treasury," and I hope upon reflection the chairman of the committee will accept the modification of the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I can not accept that, because it will doubtless mean losing the item entirely. If the Senator wishes to strike it all out of the bill, he knows the way to do it, but it may involve in conference the proposition that we shall have to recede from it altogether. It is the current law. It is a law, it is true, that was enacted in an appropriation bill, but it was definite that this position should be that of Undersecretary, just the same as we have had an Undersecretary of State for some time. That law is effective, of course, until the 30th of June. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee will fail.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether or not when the law was passed creating the Undersecretary, and which, as I understand the Senator, expires on the 30th of June, there was repeal of the then existing law which provided for three or four assistant secretaries of the Treasury?

Mr. WARREN. There was no change made then in the law.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether the law as it then existed differentiated those secretaries and labeled one the first assistant and another the second assistant?

Mr. WARREN. It did not.

Mr. KING. They merely stood as so many Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury?

Mr. WARREN. Yes; as so many Assistant Secretaries of the Treasury.

Mr. KING. What is the necessity for changing? If the three provided for by law were insufficient to perform the duties incident to the work in the Treasury, why did we not create another office and call it "fourth assistant secretary," instead of creating an office and calling it "Undersecretary"?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator knows in all business matters that to have nearly a half dozen understudies, all of equal position, does not lead to as good government as it does to have, as we have had, a first assistant, second assistant, and so forth. That would provide for it, of course, but there are various duties that come to the Undersecretary, or whomever acts for the Secretary, differing somewhat from the usual duties of an Assistant Secretary. He has to be capable and able in the position to act as the Secretary would in case of the Secretary's illness, absence, or anything of that kind.

There is a line of duties covering the entire establishment that fall to the Undersecretary, whereas with the assistant secretaries one has charge of all building matters, another has charge of customs matters, and another has charge of another sort of affairs. It is better that each one should be well versed in the line of business that is in his care. But this position is supposed to go to some man who has worked his way up and understands all of the duties, and perhaps has been in all of those offices and is in a position to act as the Secretary.

As to the name, that is a matter not of my invention particularly, but it is inopportune to change it here and now. The Senator from Tennessee will admit, I trust, that a man is needed in the place to perform certain duties.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I merely wish to say in reply that I am not familiar with what is needed in the Treasury Department, so I do not make any admissions about it. What I meant to say is that while Mr. Gilbert has been for quite a while acting as Assistant Secretary of the Treasury and has made a good officer, yet I can not for the life of me see how changing his title from Undersecretary to First Assistant Secretary will interfere in any way in the world with his duties or will interfere when the matter goes to conference, because it does not change anything in the committee amendment except the name of the officer.

I take it that the House would view it this way. The Senator would be in a better position to get the amendment creating this new office through if it were not described as Undersecretary, but were described in the good old-fashioned American way as First Assistant Secretary. It does seem to me the amendment ought to be adopted.

It is not an office established by law. It was established just as I propose to establish this. It is a statement on an appropriation bill. If we are going to establish a system of undersecretaries, it ought to be done by a special bill. It ought to be brought before this body and the other body of Congress and the President and let them all pass on it. We ought to have a system of modern English nomenclature, so far as my views are concerned, if we are going to establish it in that way.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. May I make one suggestion in connection with what the Senator from Tennessee has said and what the chairman of the committee has said, to the effect that if we change it now it will probably be thrown out in conference and there will be no such office, and yet it is needed; therefore if we provide for it here and it is retained, we still have an Undersecretary from June of this year until June of 1923. When would we ever get rid of it, then, because the same argument would apply at that time that applies now?

The only way we can get rid of this, if it is objectionable to the Senate to have the terminology "Undersecretary," is right now not to make provision for an Undersecretary in this bill. In the deficiency bill we created this office and provided for it until the expiration of the fiscal year. If we do not provide for it, either by name or salary, in the next fiscal year, it ceases and that is the end of it. But if we perpetuate it on that ground that the chairman of the committee has suggested, then it becomes an endless chain that we will never break.

Mr. WARREN. Unless the word "hereafter" is put in this appropriation bill it will only apply for a year. An appropriation bill carries no perpetuation unless it is so specifically provided.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator from Utah will permit me——

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. There is another thing I wish to say. I consider myself something of an American, and I am not given to aping foreign countries or turning my back on a foreign country, whatever attack it may make. But I do not see any point in saying that we are aping foreign countries in giving this office the title of Undersecretary. Because it has been found successful in other countries, there is no reason why we should repudiate it here.

The man to whom the Senator from Tennessee alludes, Mr. Gilbert, who it seems everyone acknowledges is a very able and capable man, was appointed under the old Wilson administration as Assistant Secretary, the only place that could be fixed in the law then. I think it was only a few weeks perhaps before the termination of the former Secretary's term. With the incoming of the new Secretary he asked provision for this position, just as the State Department asked it, because, on account of the war and on account of all these matters that we have to conduct with foreign countries, relating to the foreign debts, and so forth, it is rather difficult for foreigners to distinguish among a group of assistant secretaries and difficult for them to accredit to some one who may sign papers that importance that they do to the man who they know represents the Government of the United States, the Secretary himself.

The Undersecretary becomes more efficient in that position. I do not know that the man himself ever asked for it. I know that when the matter was brought before the committee there was no intention on the part of the committee to ape foreign countries. It is a mere matter of business. Our estimates come to us for the appropriation for this year. This item is estimated for as Undersecretary. Of course, to go outside of that name would take us outside of the estimates and throw it out, as I said before, in the matter of conference. If the Senator wishes to strike it out entirely, and if that is the wish of the Senate, I yield, of course, but I can not consent to accepting the amendment. I shall have to ask a vote on it.

Mr. KING. I am sure I do not understand the law as it is interpreted by the Senator from Wyoming, if I have correctly construed his observations. I have understood that any Secretary of a department, whether it be State, War, Navy, Interior, or any other department of the Government, might designate one of his assistants to discharge his duties ad interim. For instance, Secretary Fall is now absent from the city.

Mr. WARREN. There is no question about that. I never crossed that line at all.

Mr. KING. Secretary Fall is now absent from the city. Judge Finney is the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior. I am not sure whether that is his title; he may be Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator may say his title is First Assistant Secretary, and he is a most efficient, high-class officer, who has grown up in the Interior Department, one might say.

Mr. KING. He is acting and discharging all the duties that would be discharged by Secretary Fall if he were here in the city. As I understand the law, the same applies to other departments, and we do not need to label a man Undersecretary in order to vest him with the authority which is conferred by law upon his superior, the Secretary of a given department of the Government. Secretary Mellon may designate among his various assistant secretaries Mr. Gilbert, a most efficient and capable man, to perform the duties which he himself performs, to sign his name, and other assistant secretaries could take no offense that the duties of the Secretary have been devolved upon Mr. Gilbert or any other person who may be designated.

It seems to me that we can with propriety continue the old system. It has grown up with our administrative departments and it has worked well. Obviously if we change in this department now other officials will insist that they receive the same title. Judge Finney could with propriety ask to be denominated Undersecretary of the Interior Department, and so with each department of the Government. It changes the entire system. It seems a discrimination that is unwarranted and that would be resented by officials of the various departments of the Government. The other departments would say, "Our work is just as important as that of the Treasury Department," and the First Assistant Secretary in the Interior Department or in the Post Office Department would say, "My work is just as important, calls for as many hours of labor, calls for as high a degree of ability, as the Undersecretary of State or the Undersecretary of the Treasury, and I insist that the law shall be amended and that I be named undersecretary," and so with each department of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I desire to call attention to the fact that the only time the question has ever been brought up in a regular appropriation bill, as I recall, was in the Army reorganization bill where it was attempted to create the office of Undersecretary of War and that, as I recall, failed. All the other Secretaries that we have now are provided for in this roundabout way through appropriation bills which expire from year to year, and it is just a question of whether we want to continue them or not.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that if we are going to change the system we had better do it in a general bill and determine in which departments there shall be undersecretaries and indicate that the other departments shall not have undersecretaries. However, to single out this department now and give it an undersecretary seems to me to be unwarranted. It would be very bad legislation and set a very bad precedent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to confirm the impression which the Senator from Utah has just expressed regarding the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior. There is an express provision conferring upon him almost identically the same powers which this bill seeks to confer upon the Undersecretary of the Treasury. My judgment is that the purpose of changing this title is simply to get a little more money for some assistant secretary without involving the question of the compensation of all of the assistant secretaries.

Mr. OVERMAN. And to get a little bigger title.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. To get a bigger title and to differentiate them in some way so that they may say that they ought to have a little higher salary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us make this official First Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Utah, that there is no reason in the world for changing the designation. Let us confront the facts and realize just the purpose of this proposed legislation. It is to get a little more money for some assistant secretary; that is all there is to it. If this official is entitled to more money than is some other assistant secretary, let him have it; but if he is not do not let us pass the legislation in this way. It is simply a convenient method of differentiation regarding this particular office.

I wish also to say that if there is any assistant secretary in the Government service to-day who is entitled to have his compensation increased it is the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior. He not only has high administrative duties to perform but also very wide and important judicial functions to perform. This whole matter should be gone into. Personally, I feel that all the assistant secretaries ought to have more salary; they ought at least to receive sufficient compensation to enable them to live on their salary in the city of Washington.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am expressing no opinion as to the salaries which should be paid, but I do submit, as indicated by the remarks of my friend from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], that if we increase the compensation in one department we shall find it very difficult to refuse to grant like increases in other departments.

It is impossible to differentiate. I agree with what my friend from New Mexico has said concerning Judge Finney, the First Assistant Secretary of the Interior. In the first place, Judge Finney is a great lawyer, a man of fine ability, a man who for many years has devoted himself with the utmost assiduity and care to the tremendous responsibilities which have rested upon him. He worked himself up until he is now First Assistant Secretary in the Interior Department. He has important work there. He passes upon the titles to property which is worth millions of dollars. If we increase the compensation of the assistant secretary in any one department, it seems to me that we shall have to increase salaries in most, if not, all of the others. I express no opinion as to whether they should be increased, but before voting to increase any salaries I should want to inquire into the matter a little further, and see just how far this legislation which is now before us may lead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Before we vote on this proposition, I desire to ask: Is it the intention of this provision to make the position referred to a permanent place?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as I have before stated, appropriation bills carry appropriations merely for the ensuing fiscal year. As to whether this shall be made a permanent position depends, first, upon whether it may be estimated for hereafter; and, second, what may be the action of Congress hereafter.

Mr. HARRISON. The reason I asked the Senator the question—I know he is always candid and frank—is even though this appropriation bill does not contain the word "hereafter" and on its face this would not seem to be a permanent place, nevertheless the bill provides that the nomination shall come from the President to the Senate, that the officer shall be confirmed by the Senate, and that on the death, resignation, or sickness of the Secretary of the Treasury the Undersecretary shall perform the duties of the Secretary of the Treasury. So to all intents and purposes, it seems to me, and I am wondering if it does not seem to the Senator from Wyoming, that it is the intention to make this a permanent place, even though the word "hereafter" is not embraced in the language?

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Mississippi has the same right to prognosticate as to the future as have I.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. However, as the Senator from Mississippi knows, a system of classification has been under consideration and preparation for some time which will include all of these assistant secretaries.

I am ready to say that, in my opinion, the assistant secretaries, taken as a class, are receiving too little pay; and when I say that I say it with all respect for our ideas of economy.

When it is remembered what class of men it is necessary for us to have in these positions and that their salaries are now the same, perhaps, as they were 50 years ago—certainly they are the same as they were 30 years ago—I consider the salaries which they receive at present are entirely too low. They have, of course, very many times more work to do than they formerly had, and their costs and expenses of living are much more, especially when they have to live here in Washington, for all of us know what it means to live in Washington, so far as expenses are concerned.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I realize that.

Mr. WARREN. All these matters, I hope, will be taken up and considered during the next 12 months, and I trust that matters may be adjusted accordingly.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Wyoming, however, has not as yet stated that, in his opinion, it is the intention to make the position involved in the pending amendment a permanent place?

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, we know that if the Secretary of the Treasury urges that it be made a permanent position, in all probability it will be made so; and it seems to me very much as though it is the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury that it shall be made a permanent position. The item was included in the last deficiency bill and it is again included this year. It is also provided that the nomination of the officer shall be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment to the committee amendment may be stated before we vote upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the committee amendment, on page 2, lines 2 and 3, it is proposed to strike out the word "Undersecretary" and in lieu thereof to insert "First Assistant Secretary."

Mr. McKELLAR and Mr. HARRISON asked for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So Mr. McKELLAR'S amendment to the amendment reported by the committee was rejected.

Mr. KING. I reserve the right to call for a separate vote upon this item in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 13, before the word "three," to strike out "assistant to the Secretary, $5,000," and in line 21, to change the total appropriation from "$70,760" to "$73,260," so as to read—

3 Assistant Secretaries, at $5,000 each; clerk to the Secretary, $3,000; executive clerk, $2,400; stenographer, $1,800; 3 private secretaries, 1 to each Assistant Secretary, at $1,800 each; Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $4,000; clerks—2 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 1 of class 1; chief messenger, $1,100; 2 assistant chief messengers, at $1,000 each; messengers—3 at $900 each, 4 at $840 each; messenger boy, $600; in all, $73,260.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, at this point I wish to ask unanimous consent that the clerks at the desk may correct all totals where there are changes in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee for a general statement, if he will be kind enough to give it to the Senate, as to whether the aggregate amount carried in the bill for employees in the Treasury Department is greater or less than for the current year. So far as I can see from the bill and from the report before us, there is no way of instituting a comparison between the appropriations for former years for the Treasury Department and the appropriations carried by this bill.

Mr. WARREN. As to that particular, the Senator will excuse me if I take a few seconds.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I have the list here. The total was $1,588,480 last year where now it is $1,359,950—a matter of some $229,000 less than a year ago.

Mr. KING. Does that saving result from a curtailment of the number of employees?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KING. Or does it result largely from there being a smaller amount appropriated for fixtures, furniture, and so forth?

Mr. WARREN. It is almost entirely for fewer employees. The Senator, I think, can rest assured of the fact that no salaries have been raised in this bill; so that if there would be an increase anywhere—and increases are few, if any—it will not be in the matter of salaries.

Mr. KING. I am very glad to learn that the aggregate amount carried by the appropriation bill, as stated by the Senator, is smaller than last year.

Mr. WARREN. I desire to say to the Senator, who is always anxious, and should be, to look over these matters, that I have here the list as it came from the House, with all the items—the items of the year before, the items of this year, the difference in the estimates, the decreases and increases—and I will leave that with the Senator, so that he may examine it.

Mr. KING. I am very much obliged, Mr. President, because, as I have stated, the bill as it comes from the committee furnishes no guide by which we may determine those things.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, yes. Here is the Senate report, which I will also give to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I have a copy of the report and have read it very carefully, and I have read the hearings.

Mr. WARREN. It is entirely unnecessary to take all the items that were in that bill, because that report and this one, together, tell the whole story.

Mr. KING. No; the Senator is in error as to that, and he is usually accurate. He is in error in this respect only, that the bill as it came from the committee of the Senate and the report submitted by the committee do not institute comparisons between the appropriations for the various items in this bill and those in the bills of preceding years; and that is what I was about to state.

Mr. WARREN. Every change from the report that the Senator has in his hand is shown here.

Mr. KING. Perhaps the report which the Senator now has given me may enable one, by taking some little time, to institute a comparison between the appropriations here for various items and those carried in the bills for former years. May I ask the Senator, in the aggregate, how many less employees are provided for in this bill than in the former bill?

Mr. WARREN. That would take a summing up of all the departments, which would require looking through the list which I have given the Senator. Of course, the Senator knows that in the case of the employees under lump-sum appropriations—for instance, take the Interstate Commerce Commission—no list of them is furnished to us officially. Every two years and sometimes every year, perhaps even oftener at times, we have a list sent to the committee, which does not come through the Bureau of the Budget or the regular course, so that we may have some idea of the situation; but to state on a given date the exact number is rather difficult, because, as I say, of these lump-sum employees. I speak of the Interstate Commerce Commission only because its appropriation is one of the largest of the lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that the number of employees in the District of Columbia before the war was approximately 37,000. According to the last information which I had, the number of employees exceeded 80,000. I was wondering if the committee had any information as to the number of reductions which have been made, and whether there is any promise of realization of the preelection promises of our Republican friends that there would be a reduction to substantially 40,000, bringing down the total nearly to the number that were employed here prior to the war.

Mr. WARREN. I dare say the Senator will not be able to quote any estimate of 40,000 from those who knew exactly what they were figuring on. Some loose remark to that effect may have been made.

Mr. KING. No; it came, as I recall, from the congressional committee of the Republican Party. I do not desire, however, to hold them to their preelection promises.

Mr. WARREN. I think that would be highly proper, though I did not see that statement, and I assume that the Senator is no more careful in looking out for what is said on the Republican side than I am.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is more interested in finding the faults of the Democrats.

Mr. WARREN. In view of the progress of the country, it is probable that there never will be a recession to the numbers of the earlier days; but we have very materially decreased the numbers. For instance, in one department alone some 20,000 have been dismissed, and there has been a general lopping off. It is occurring from day to day, and, of course, at the end of the fiscal year still more will go; but from month to month the dismissal of employees is going on. The Senator will realize that as he watches the different appropriation bills from time to time. It can not be done in a minute; it can not be done in a month; it can not be done in many years, for that matter, because there are so many matters hanging over yet from the war that require settlement—for instance, the preparation and examination of all these many, many claims that amount to hundreds of millions of dollars. They require the attention of certain employees that are only, as the Senator realizes, for the special purpose. As to the regular line of clerical employment, that will be comparably fully as low, as I understand the figures—and I have been rather conversant with them for the last 30 years—as at the time of which the Senator speaks. When he speaks of the number—that is, when he speaks of 37,000—it depends a good deal upon who is reporting, and how he is reporting. For instance, a man will tell you about the Army, how many persons there are in the Army, and so forth, and you will put that down as a total. The question happens to occur to you: "Does that include the Medical Department?" "No; that does not include the Medical Department"; and so it is with other departments. There are employees who do not appear in the regular appropriation bills as we go along, except as represented in the lump sums, and there we find them by the frequent reports which we ask to have furnished us.

Mr. KING. There is very much that the Senator says to which I assent; and yet the number that I gave a few moments ago as approximately 37,000 before the war embraced substantially all within certain categories. Within the same categories the number of employees a few months ago was over 80,000. There has not been the reduction in the same categories that there should have been, and, in my opinion, a great many employees are being retained in the departments whose services ought to be discontinued. I sincerely hope that the vigilant Senator from Wyoming—and he is vigilant, and one who is pledged to economy—will continue his efforts in the direction of economy and in the reduction of the number of the personnel in the Government employ.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, just as a matter of correction of the RECORD, when the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] to the first amendment proposed by the committee on page 2 was rejected, the Chair made some announcement which I gathered later was to the effect that "without objection the amendment of the committee is agreed to."

My attention was diverted at the time. What I want to have appear is that the Chair put the question on the amendment, so that it may appear that the amendment was agreed to, but I do not want it to appear as though it was agreed to without objection. In other words, the RECORD should show that the amendment proposed by the committee was agreed to, but not that it was agreed to without objection, because I object to that amendment, and I do not want it to appear as if it was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Utah reserved the right to have the amendment to the amendment voted upon in the Senate. Am I correct?

Mr. KING. The Senator is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 3, line 3, to insert the word "Undersecretary" and a comma at the beginning of the line.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading was continued to line 23, page 8.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I want to inquire about one item to which my attention has been called. I am told that in one or two of the departments there are as many as 10 or 12 purchasing agencies. I noticed in this bill several provisions, as I recall, for purchasing agencies. I have understood that Gen. Dawes was bringing all of the purchasing agencies under one head. May I inquire if his labors have eventuated to such an extent that they have coordinated, and there is one purchasing or supply department for these various governmental departments?

Mr. WARREN. That has been done. Formerly the purchasing was done in each department by the department itself.

Mr. KING. And there would be several agencies in one department.

Mr. WARREN. When the war came on it was observed that the departments were bidding against each other, bidding up the prices. An attempt was made to collect them into one department, and practically that was done. When the war was over and an attempt, perhaps, was made to carry out the old system, the Budget officer halted that and has confined the purchases entirely to the general purchasing agency. We have also now a general supply department, which takes all of the furniture, all of the typewriters, and all of the other property of the Government, repairs and refinishes, disposes of the useless, and distributes the balance as wanted, of course keeping track and charging the departments with the proper amounts of money, but doing it in a businesslike way.

Mr. KING. What I wanted to find out was whether this general supply committee, provided for on page 8 in this bill, relates only to the Treasury Department, or do its activities extend to other departments?

Mr. WARREN. They have this coordination, which brings them all together. For instance, we have in the hearings held before the House committee the testimony of Mr. Jacques, who testified as to the establishing of the office of chief coordinator and said:

> It was established in the committee. They have no money. We are taking care of their telephones and expense for stationery, photostat, and mimeograph work and a great deal of general clerical work. It is costing the committee about $500 a month.
> The CHAIRMAN. Please tell us about the chief coordinator, how he functions.
> Mr. JACQUES. The chief coordinator was designated to coordinate the distribution of surplus material, supplies, and equipment, and perform certain other functions.

That is as to the supplies; it is done in the same way in regard to the purchases. Mr. Jacques continued:

> In the first place, there was created under his direction a Federal liquidation board, composed of one representative from each of the executive departments, and the superintendent of supplies was designated to represent the 29 independent establishments in the District of Columbia, to keep that board down to workable size. This board has located large accumulations of material—

And so forth.

That is the supply department. I have not turned to the other part of it, but the same thing applies to the purchasing activities. The wants of the different departments are brought to the coordinated department, and the purchases are all made through one agency.

Mr. KING. Let me see if I understand the Senator correctly. On page 8 provision is made for a general supply committee. What I am inquiring about is this: Is there to be a general supply committee for each department, or does the machinery created take care of all the departments in Washington?

Mr. WARREN. It is just as it states—a general supply committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. That refers to the Treasury Department?

Mr. WARREN. No; it applies to the entire Government. Of course, it is in the Treasury Department. It has to be in some department, and more naturally would be in the Treasury Department, because that is where the money comes from when the things are to be paid for.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is all under the head of the Treasury, and I would infer, unless the Senator has inquired into that——

Mr. WARREN. What would the Senator suggest? What department except the Treasury does the Senator think the Supply Department should be under?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is all right to put it under the Treasury Department, I take it, but it ought to appear clearly that the activities of this committee are not confined to the Treasury Department, but that it refers to all the departments of the Government, a consolidated supply committee for all of the departments.

Mr. WARREN. As we go along with the appropriations, the Senator will discover that there are no other supply provisions.

Mr. FLETCHER. The language is not clear. It simply provides for salaries of employees, office equipment, fuel, light, and so forth, "and other necessary expenses for carrying into effect the Executive order of December 3, 1918," $120,000. That, of course, is a very large sum, if this committee's activities are confined solely to the Treasury. If it takes in all of the departments of the Government, perhaps that would not be an excessive amount; but the bill itself does not indicate.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator would hardly expect an explanation of every appropriation, because if you only appropriate for the one, that in itself carries with it the explanation that it is the only one.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is quite true; but the hearings on the bill ought to indicate what this is for. If the Senator is clear that this work is to be done for all the departments, then I can see some reason for these large amounts; but if this committee is simply intended to serve the Treasury Department, it does look like an excessive amount for salaries of employees and others. The hearings, of course, would indicate what it was for. I do not see anything in the bill to indicate what their duties are.

The reading was resumed at line 24, page 8, and continued to line 14, page 11.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it may seem an unimportant matter, but I inquire of the Senator if he does not regard it as unwise to fix the maximum which may be paid for machines, or for anything, such as is indicated here?

Mr. WARREN. I think if the Senator had had the experience we have had as to typewriters, he would see the necessity for it. Prices have been paid to the different men supplying machines which have seemed extravagant and I might almost say outrageous at times; so last year, to protect the Government, we provided that they should not exceed certain prices for certain machines. It also provides that this supply department shall take those used machines in exchange. If the Senator has a typewriter which is unfit for use, he turns it in and gets another in its place, and his machine is remade and goes to some other office and is used there.

Mr. KING. What I had in mind was that if you fix a maximum which may be paid, the maximum will be charged.

Mr. WARREN. The maximum that will be paid for typewriters is below what the Senator and I would have to pay, and they will only accept it from the Government because it is fixed in the law. The prices were cut down to the bone, and if the Senator thinks they ought to be cut further at some time, of course, it might be attempted, but we thought we were making it just as low as the machines could be built for. There is a list in the hearings which the Senator has in his hand which were held before the House committee.

Mr. KING. I was afraid that when there is stated in the law an amount which may be paid, that amount will be paid, and that becomes the minimum at which the article may be purchased.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator would be right, if that had been done in the usual careless way; but it was after weeks of consideration, and I am sure if the Senator will look the prices over he will be satisfied.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, I ask the Senator in charge of the interchangeable mileage ticket bill if he wishes to proceed with it.

Mr. ROBINSON. It is the purpose of those interested in the unfinished business to proceed now for a time, at least, to the consideration of that bill, and as I intend to submit a request for unanimous consent to fix a time to vote upon the bill tomorrow, I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator withhold that for a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, Senate bill 848.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator do that with the view of presenting his unanimous-consent request now?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. I will submit the unanimous-consent request first, if the Chair desires. I ask unanimous consent that at not later than 3 o'clock to-morrow the Senate shall proceed to vote upon the bill S. 848 and all amendments that may be pending and all amendments that may be offered, without further debate, and that when the Senate concludes its labors today it shall take a recess until noon to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have noticed nearly every time we have a unanimous-consent agreement to close the consideration of a bill at a certain hour without any debate thereafter that important amendments come in or are presented, and we do not have any opportunity to discuss or consider them in any way. I have come to the conclusion that it is very unwise to make an agreement of that sort. I have no objection to an agreement that after 1 o'clock or 2 o'clock or 3 o'clock if any amendment shall be presented it may be debated not exceeding five minutes by any Senator, but to allow amendments to be offered and no debate at all to be had I think is a very bad practice. I feel that I shall have to object to the request in the form in which it is presented.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well; we will proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not desire the calling of a quorum at this time?

Mr. ROBINSON. Not at the present time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it was my intention to move to take up the funding bill this afternoon, because I understood that we were about ready to vote upon the measure before the Senate. I do not know whether there is any danger of any great delay, but I wish to give notice that I shall make the motion, at least, to take up the funding bill immediately after the disposition of the pending bill, and if that bill is not disposed of by to-morrow I shall move to take up the funding bill on Monday.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I have little doubt that a vote can be reached some time to-morrow upon the pending bill and all amendments which have been offered or which may be offered. A little later in the day it is my intention to renew, in a somewhat modified form, the request I have made, after I have had an opportunity to confer with others who are particularly interested in the bill now before the Senate. I know that there are some Senators who desire to speak, but I think some time to-morrow we can easily conclude the consideration of the bill. I think we might proceed for the present with the consideration of the bill with that understanding.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as one somewhat concerned in the consideration of the pending bill, I desire to say that I want to reach a vote upon it at the earliest possible moment. I am ready to vote at any time. If, however, there are amendments offered to the bill which are not germane to the subject embraced by the bill, it would be quite impossible, perhaps, to reach a conclusion to-morrow. I do not anticipate those amendments. The Senator from Arkansas knows what I have in mind, and if such amendments were offered to the bill as we both understand might be offered, then it would not be ready for disposition to-morrow or in the near future.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas allow me a moment?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say, in connection with the bill before the Senate and the notice given by the Senator from North Dakota, that I have been striving for a week now to obtain consideration of the appropriation bill, and we have gotten fairly well started this morning.

Of course, the Senator from North Dakota knows the importance of getting these bills into conference to make way for others that are to follow. I hope there may be no contest between the appropriation bill, partly finished, and the funding bill, which I join the Senator in wishing to get before the Senate. Doubtless the Senator will expect me to finish the appropriation bill in time to give way and make the coast clear for his funding bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say to the Senator that in giving this notice I have been acting in harmony with the plan adopted in conference by the Republicans to consider the bills in the order stated. The Senator from Wyoming was present at the conference, and I think understood that the intention was that we should follow the pending bill with the bill for funding the foreign obligations.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as a member of the subcommittee appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce to take the pending bill under consideration, I think it is my duty to have something to say in reference to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator to submit the resolution he is about to present, provided it does not lead to any discussion.

FEDERAL FARM LAND BANK LOANS.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the Chamber to attend a meeting of the Finance Committee. I present a resolution of inquiry for certain information from the Federal Farm Loan Board, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 222), as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Farm Loan Board is hereby requested to furnish to the Senate, as soon as practicable, information as to whether any farmer, national farm loan association, or land bank agent has been compelled or requested to pay or has paid any commission, fee, or other charge not authorized under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act, approved July 17, 1916, as amended, in the securing or making of a loan under the provisions of such act, or has been compelled or requested to purchase or has purchased any stock in a joint-stock land bank at a price greater than the par value of such stock, together with the amount of any such commission, fee, or charge, and the price paid for any such stock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the object of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the resolution frankly states the object of it. It proposes to ask the Federal Farm Loan Board whether in the borrowing of money any farmer has been compelled to pay a commission that is not authorized by law. I have heard, and a number of letters I have received indicate to me that there has been such a practice going on, and I want to ask the Federal Farm Loan Board if it is true.

Mr. POMERENE. Commissions paid to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. Paid to the bank lending the money. I want to find out whether it is true or not.

Mr. POMERENE. That is, the farm land bank?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. I have 20 or more letters stating that in such cases it has occurred, and I want to know whether it is going on now, and if it is I want to have it stopped.

Mr. POMERENE. If that practice is going on we ought to know it.

The Senate by unanimous consent proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator, before the resolution is agreed to, a question with reference to the matter? I have had a great many letters, too, but the letters I have received are to the effect that applications have been made for loans, but they are unable to take care of those applications, saying there is no money on hand. Would the Senator object to an additional clause being inserted in his resolution asking for the amount of applications now on file, which they are unable to take care of?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever. I have no objection to that. However, I do not wish the matter to lead to any discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in connection with the remarks just made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I will state that I have information from the president of the farm land bank of the St. Louis district that there are now on file in that district applications yet to be determined and passed upon aggregating $17,000,000; that the farm land bank has been informed by the Federal Farm Loan Board that the amount allotted to that district for the next six months is only $7,000,000, and that for this reason the farm land bank at St. Louis is pursuing a policy of restricting applications and the consideration of the same.

The total amount that will be available, under the statement made to the farm land bank at St. Louis, for the current six months is less than one-half the amount called for by applications already on file. It is a situation very serious and important in its nature, and demands relief.

Mr. POMERENE. When the Senator from Arkansas speaks of restrictions, does he mean restrictions as to the amount of the loans?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes. The total applications already on file aggregate $17,000,000. The amount of funds that will be available to meet the loans already applied for or hereafter to be applied for during the current six months is only $7,000,000, as the farm land bank at St. Louis has been informed by the Federal Farm Loan Board. So the farm land bank at St. Louis is refusing to receive applications and has been refusing to receive applications for loans for a period of some weeks or months.

Mr. SMOOT. With the adoption of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Mississippi, we will know whether they have the money on hand or not. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I move to add at the end of the resolution the following:

Also the number and amount of applications for loans now pending and the amount on hand with which to make the loans to meet the same.

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest that the Senator change it so as to make it by States.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have the floor, but as this matter is of such importance, I shall not insist on going ahead. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] that the information be furnished by States is a good one.

Mr. SMOOT. That is, that the report shall be made by States?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Instead of making it the total amount let it read the total amount by States. Let it read this way:

Also the number and amount of applications by States for loans now pending and the amount on hand with which to make the loans to meet the same.

Mr. President, I have offered that suggestion, if the Senator from South Carolina will permit me, because I had information from one of the district land banks showing that they were not accepting any more applications because there was no more money on hand. I am not saying this in criticism of the Federal Farm Loan Board; I think they are doing the best possible, but I believe at this time every cent should be provided to take care of the legitimate loans, because they are rendering great assistance to the farmers of the country. If under the present law the Federal Farm Loan Board can not sell their bonds I am in favor of the Secretary of the Treasury advancing sufficient money to take care of the situation, and the Senate has already adopted such an amendment to a bill, but I do not believe there should be any trouble in selling those bonds at this time. I am fearful, however, that the board has not offered enough to take care of the situation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, just a little while ago I was told that many of the farm loan bonds were selling at a premium. If that be true, then it must follow that there is a very great demand for them, and I am at a little bit of a loss to know why sufficient bonds could not be sold to meet all of these demands?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi will bring out that information, and I think we ought to have it.

Mr. POMERENE. The only question I have in mind is as to whether the amendment is broad enough to include that information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed after the word "stock" and before the period to insert a comma and the following:

Also the number and amount of applications by States for loans now pending and the amount on hand with which to make the loans to meet the same.

Mr. SMOOT. That is all right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

VISITORS TO NAVAL ACADEMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pursuant to the provision of the act of Congress approved August 29, 1916, relative to the appointment of the Board of Visitors to the Naval Academy, the Chair appoints the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] ex officio member of the Board of Visitors on the part of the Senate, and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. FRANCE], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. NICHOLSON], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] members.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as I had stated when I yielded to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], I was on the subcommittee. I am, of course, a member of the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I do not believe there has ever been a time in the history of the railroads of this country when the railroad business has been in so confused and chaotic condition as it now is. There seems to be absolutely no uniformity, no system. Some portions of the country are suffering by reason of local, through, and joint rates, while others, perhaps, are receiving a benefit; but in the meantime passenger and freight rates are so tremendously out of keeping with the decrease in the prices of commodities that they have become an intolerable burden.

Some of us would like very much to wait upon the arrival of the time when the Interstate Commerce Commission may call before it the representatives of the railroads and also the representatives of the producers and the manufacturers, and reach an agreement that would equalize and arrange these tariff charges. But in the meantime, in this hour of the greatest business depression we have perhaps ever seen in the history of this country, when bankruptcies and failures are increased and precipitated by virtue of the fact that transportation charges are so enormous that business and industry can not stand the burden, it does not suffice us to say that we have set up certain machinery and delegated certain powers, as we have done, and that it would be demoralizing to that machinery for us now to inject into it our opinion and our authority. The bill now pending to provide for the sale of mileage books ought to pass and become a law.

There is not a Senator here but knows that the price of the commodities of the country after they pass from the hands of the initial producer has added to it every incidental expense now imposed and whatever charge may be incurred in getting the commodity to the ultimate consumer. It would be bad enough if merely the incidental cost of transporting the commodity from the producer, through the various mutations to the consumer, were added, but everyone who has studied the facts knows that every additional initial cost is multiplied in the transition from the producer to the consumer. If we take the increase in the freight rates resulting from the order of the Director General of Railroads under Government administration and the subsequent increase, we may multiply that by two in order to ascertain the additional burden which has been laid upon the ultimate consumer. So the $2,000,000,000 in increased freight rates in this country which were authorized during and subsequent to the Government control represent a tax burden of something like $4,000,000,000 which has been imposed upon the people over and above the prewar rates.

It may be claimed that such an increased burden may have been justified during the period of the war when we could not stop to adjust these matters in their proper economic relations, and that the prices of commodities at that time were raised very largely as compared to the prewar prices; but since the war has ended, within a twelvemonth, the market price of the produce which makes up the freight of this country has dropped to a level as low as or lower than the prewar prices, while the freight and passenger rates still maintain their war-time and subsequent war-time level.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH. I will.

Mr. KELLOGG. But the increase in the operating expenses of the railroads has absorbed all that, and more too, has it not?

Mr. SMITH. It is contended that operating expenses have absorbed it, and I admit that to be approximately true; it was approximately true, as shown by a table which was submitted to me just before my chairmanship of the Committee on Interstate Commerce expired, which indicated that the net increase of income by virtue of the increased rate and the net increase in operating expenses about balanced each other; but the Senator from Minnesota must remember that at that time all material and labor were at the war level. I will cite him an instance now to show that that condition does not now obtain. At that time ties, which enter into the upkeep of the roads, were selling at from $1 to $1.20 a tie, while to-day they are being sold in the market at around 35 and 40 cents a tie, representing a decrease of something over 50 per cent in that one item.

Steel has gone down; construction material, the cost of living, and all the items which enter into railroad construction have gone down, and yet the price of freight and passenger carriage remains at the ultimate level which was reached not only during the war but which has been added to since the war.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, is the Senator certain of his statement in so far as it relates to the price of steel rails? He said steel had gone down. I ask the question, if the Senator will pardon me, for this reason, that when one of the railway executives—I think Mr. Kruttschnitt—was before our committee some months ago I called his attention to the fact that the price of steel had gone down. He said that was true of shapes and certain forms of structural steel, but was not true of steel rails, and the steel mills said they could not reduce the price of rails. I am simply interested in knowing what the fact is.

Mr. SMITH. I believe I recall the query put by the Senator from Ohio to Mr. Kruttschnitt when he was before our committee; and I digress here——

Mr. POMERENE. I think the price of steel rails ought to be reduced.

Mr. SMITH. That is what I am coming to. I digress here to enforce my argument by the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio. Those industries which could not by artificial combination support themselves at the level reached during the war and subsequent thereto have been mercilessly sacrificed, while those which could help themselves did help themselves and are continuing to help themselves, as the railroads are helping themselves, while the general public is the "goat," and must wait upon some arbitration somewhere in order to obtain relief. We are their representatives, and we know—there is not a Senator on this floor who does not know—that an average rate of 3.6 cents per mile is not justified or justifiable in view of the present cost of living, the distressed conditions of the people, and the economic and social necessities for travel amongst the people.

I will go still further, Mr. President, and say that it was an unjust imposition upon those who travel in sleeping cars and use sleeping-car accommodations to put a supertax of 50 per cent on the regular passenger rate because it was considered that such cars were occupied and patronized by those who were best able to pay, and therefore the burden would fall upon those who, because of their means, were more likely to be able to meet it. Everybody knows that a sleeping car now is just as much a necessity to the traveling public as is the day coach.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator will correct me if I am wrong, but I desire to ask him a question. Is it not true that the original application of the railroad companies for an increase of revenue, which was made very soon—within a month or a month and a half—after the passage of the transportation act, did not include any increase in passenger rates?

Mr. SMITH. I think that is correct.

Mr. CUMMINS. When the Labor Board, in July, 1920, passed upon the dispute which had arisen before Federal control terminated it increased the labor cost of the operation of the railroads about $650,000,000 a year, and it was in view of that increase of the labor cost, ordered by the Labor Board, that the Interstate Commerce Commission approved the increase of passenger rates from 3 cents a mile to the point at which they now stand. If the Senator challenges the wisdom or the justice of the increase in wages ordered by the Labor Board, I can easily understand his objection to the increase in passenger rates, but I am not prepared to say that that increase was not justified.

The cost of living had reached its peak about the 1st of July, 1920, and not only was that true of the supplies which we all must have in order to live, but it was true of all the supplies which a railroad was compelled to buy in order to maintain itself. We did not reach the peak of the cost of living or the cost of commodities until about the 1st of July or the 1st of September, 1920.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I understand that the findings of the Labor Board increased the expenses of the railroads in approximately the sums to which the Senator has called attention; but I maintain that the revenues of the roads, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] so well said yesterday, would be greatly enhanced, the net return would be greater, if the freight and passenger rates were put at a point where the people could use the roads with something like profit to themselves, and not simply when driven by necessity and forced to suffer a loss in their use. It simply means that only those things are going to market at present that realize a profit after there is subtracted from the price for which they are sold the cost of the carriage, and that only those travel for pleasure who are so abundantly wealthy as to enable them to go. The balance go because necessity forces them to go; so that the law of increasing and diminishing returns has exemplified itself in the present plight of the railroads.

In addition to that, while neither the Senator nor I, perhaps, are in a position to state dogmatically, it is a reasonable inference that the $600,000,000 additional that will be paid to labor has been more than discounted by the cheapening of the material and the necessary expenses that the railroads must incur. If those things did not adequately cover it, a proper lowering of passenger and freight rates and the additional tonnage that would result would supplement and more than meet the additional cost of labor.

I for one am not going to stand upon the floor of this Chamber and say that I shall inveigh against any adequate wage paid to the people who hold the throttle, who punch the tickets, and who fabricate the material that goes into our roads. I believe that a careful study of that question will show that the cost to the public is not the tremendous cost of labor, but the cost of the tremendous stock issues and other expenses that could be very well reduced if those in high places were willing to meet the American public upon the basis of ordinary returns for service rendered; but they are not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. Would not the Senator consider the Pennsylvania, the Chicago & North Western, the Northern Pacific, the Great Northern, and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul as standard, first-class railroads?

Mr. SMITH. I have not as intimate a knowledge of certain ones that the Senator names as I have of the Pennsylvania. I think the Pennsylvania is.

Mr. KELLOGG. The others are equally good with the Pennsylvania. Does the Senator know that not one of them earned its interest last year, to say nothing about the stock of which the Senator speaks?

Mr. SMITH. Is the Senator prepared to say that the extremely high rates of freight and passenger fares do not contribute to that condition?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am not. I say the freight rates and passenger rates are too high; but when the Senator speaks about the dividends on watered stock, not one of these lines began to earn its interest last year, and they also reduced their operating expenses very greatly.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am fully aware of the fact that complaint has come up, and I am not going here and now to enter into a discussion of the specific figures that have been furnished all the members of the committee as to the return upon the investment, the additional cost, and so forth. I am going just now to address myself to the one fact that taking the market price of a great many of our staple products the markets are absolutely shut to them, not because the difference between the cost of production and what they would bring at the market would not leave something of a profit, but because the freight to the market eats up the profit and makes it unprofitable for producers to continue even in this deplorable condition of affairs.

The American people know that it is practically impossible to-day to embark with any prospect of success in any kind of an enterprise that depends upon a market at any appreciable distance from the place of production, for the reason that though there is a difference between the cost of production and the market price, when the freight is subtracted there is no profit left. Shall we who have this matter in charge sit here and wait upon the slow process in specific cases where we know the conditions are absolutely wrong until the Interstate Commerce Commission and all the parties in interest shall have thrashed out the matter in hearings, and then an order shall be issued, when perhaps the life and death of some of the best producing institutions in this country is hanging in the balance and will be decided within six months?

I hope the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] will become law, because it will go on record as a specific announcement from the Senate that we not only believe theoretically what we are saying to our constituents, that there should be a reduction in passenger rates, but that we have given proof of the sincerity of our declarations by the passage of this bill.

I listened with great interest to what the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] said yesterday, and there was force in what he had to say in reference to the effect of the passage of this bill in reducing the net total income of the roads, which, as he said, would jeopardize the operation of the roads, and therefore other places would have to be found where the amount subtracted in this way might be added, thus increasing the burden on others who must utilize the roads. That is going upon the assumption that the present rate is both the maximum and the minimum; that it marks the exact point where increasing and diminishing returns meet; that you will get the maximum out of 3.6 cents, and you would suffer loss below it and loss above it—above it by decreasing travel and below it by not increasing it sufficiently to make up for the difference in the rate. My contention is that it is not merely a question of the traveling men of the country, but that if you will make the denomination of these mileage books not 5,000 miles but 2,000 miles and then fix the tariff, the increased travel on the roads will more than offset any loss that might be incurred by virtue of the reduction.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The position which I attempted to announce yesterday was this: I am not qualified to express an opinion upon the point just stated by the Senator from South Carolina. There are 11 men who constitute the Interstate Commerce Commission. They have given the subject constant study with all the aids which can possibly be summoned to enlighten their judgment. They think, obviously, that a decrease in the passenger rates would not increase the net income of the railroads from passenger service.

I would rather accept their judgment upon that question than to rely upon my own; and, if the Senator will accept it in the spirit in which I state it, I would rather rely upon their judgment on that point than upon the judgment of the Senator from South Carolina or any other Senator or any other Member of Congress.

It is for that reason, and that reason alone, that I am opposing the passage of this bill in its present form. I believe that it is a question which ought to be decided from time to time by the Interstate Commerce Commission, and not by Congress. In other words, I think the Interstate Commerce Commission is better qualified than Congress is to say what the rates, both passenger and freight, should be, in order to do justice at once to the people of the country and to the railroads of the country. We have never tried to do it before, and I am hoping that we will not attempt it at this time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, of course just at this time it is not so much a question of judgment on some particular technical matter as it is a matter of fair inference to any intelligent man upon the mere face of it. The prewar passenger rate was approximately uniformly 2 cents a mile. It is now 3.6 cents a mile. The purchasing power of the dollar before the war was about on a parity with that, or reasonably close to it, as a justifiable fare. The purchasing power of the dollar now is as great or greater than it was previous to the war; and yet, with practically identically the same railroad mileage that we had before, with practically no additional expense except the yearly overhead charges, we are met with an increase of 66⅔ per cent in passenger rates, and it is still maintained that if the volume of travel were at the maximum that is no more than sufficient to meet the expenses of the roads.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator will not forget, I am sure, in making that comparison, that the dollar is just as much depreciated in the hands of the railroad companies as it is in the hands of the ordinary individual. It buys a great deal less than it formerly did. That is the reason, I assume, it was found necessary to increase the rates. When the railroad company comes to buy steel its dollar is not worth half as much as it was before. When it comes to pay for labor the dollar is not worth more than half as much as it was before, and therefore it must have more dollars.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator has the cart before the horse.

Mr. CUMMINS. No.

Mr. SMITH. The tariff on a passenger is now 66⅔ per cent higher than it was previous to the war. That is a fixed thing that the railroad gets in the form of a dollar. It gets 66⅔ cents more in every dollar than it got before the war, and yet it buys for perhaps 50 cents less.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, the Senator from South Carolina may have had the cart before the horse. When the railroad company has its dollar it must do something with it.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. It must either buy supplies, buy labor, pay dividends, or pay interest upon bonds. When it comes to buy labor—if I may use that expression, which I very much dislike—the dollar which it receives does not purchase more than one-half as many hours of labor as it did before. When it comes to buying steel it does not buy more than three-fourths as much steel as it did before; yet it must have the same number of pounds of steel and the same number of hours of labor that it required before. It is quite mysterious to me how it can be suggested that the individual must have more in order to live than he had before, but that a corporation, a railroad company, can get along with less than it had before.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the point I was making, just taking the aggregate, is that it is admitted that the actual revenues of the railroads, if the same tonnage which obtained previous to the war were to obtain now, with the increase of freight and passenger rates, would be something in excess of or approximating $3,000,000,000 more than they received for the same service before. Granting that you pay labor more and that steel is approximately at the war prices——

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, no; steel is not at approximately the war prices now. It is a great deal higher.

Mr. SMITH. Than during the war?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is less than it was in the summer of 1920. The price has fallen very considerably; but it has not reached the prewar price.

Mr. SMITH. I did not say it had.

Mr. ROBINSON. Nothing else, substantially, has done that.

Mr. SMITH. No; nothing else has.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly not. Nothing has reached the prewar prices, except agricultural products, substantially.

Mr. SMITH. There are other things which have gone down considerably. There are different forms of manufactured articles which have gone down. I will not stop now to enumerate them, but the Senator can find a list of them by reference to any trade journal. But you are still getting, as a total revenue to the railroads, something approximating $3,000,000,000 more than for the same service rendered to the public previous to the war. I will have something to say about the cost of steel and the cost of labor before I have finished.

I do not know that any of us here would contend that in the question of wages, those who are skilled, who have grown up with and made possible the splendid transportation system of this country, should not be adequately paid for the labor performed; but even admitting that labor costs more, that is only one item in the general charge against the roads, and yet we are called upon to pay rates, passenger and freight, which would approximate something in excess of $3,000,000,000 more than we had to pay for the same service before the war, and we have less to pay it with than we had before the war. That is the situation.

Mr. CUMMINS. I agree with that general statement; we are passing through a period of very great adversity. I understand that. But putting aside the guaranty, which was not an operating revenue, the propriety of which I have always doubted, putting aside that guaranty for the first six months after the 1st of March, 1920, the railroads earned nothing in 1920, taken as a whole. They paid out for maintenance and operation all that they took in. As I recollect it, the utmost that anybody has ever claimed they earned from operating revenues as a net income during the year 1920 was $60,000,000. That is what happened to the railroads in 1920. The railroads had the benefits during four months of this increase in freight rates and the increase in passenger fares, namely, from the 1st of September, 1920, to the end of the year.

In 1921, after paying the cost of operation and maintenance, the railroads had remaining for distribution, either as interest upon bonds or as dividends upon stock, $600,000,000. The Senator does not think that is more than they ought to have had, I am sure. I can not conceive of our railroad system existing even with that revenue.

Is it contended that the revenues of the railroad companies are too large and that they ought to be reduced? That is a question which I have not heard suggested here. Possibly there are men—but I am sure the author of this bill does not agree with them—who believe that the revenues of the railroads, taken as a whole, are more than they ought to be. Now, we propose to reduce by this bill the revenues from passenger service, according to my estimate, about seventy-five or eighty or ninety million dollars. Of course, that is only an estimate; Senators can use any estimate they like on it. The position of the Senator from South Carolina is, as I understand it, not that we ought to reduce the revenues of the railroad companies, but that if we decrease the transportation rate, either the passenger rate or the freight rate, the net income of the railroad companies, instead of being reduced, will be increased. That is the Senator's contention, and my contention is that the Interstate Commerce Commission ought to be permitted to determine that dispute between the railroad companies and the shippers, and that is a question which can not be fairly and intelligently determined by the Congress of the United States. That is the whole controversy.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I know my statement will not sound like good business, but I have tried to observe the rules which must govern the ultimate control of our business enterprises. I was listening to the Senator when he said that the revenues of the roads ought to be adequate. That is true, if we are going to keep up our railroad system and furnish the people with adequate transportation. But I do maintain—and I do not mean it as a general policy—that it is a false doctrine and a pernicious one that we must take certain institutions in this country and, during the time of stress, bankruptcy, suicides, and failures, see that they maintain their incomes though the people themselves are bled white and sacrificed.

We come here and contend that our bankers must have 7 and 8 per cent, while the people are clamoring for the circulating medium in order to live at all.

We come here and clamor that the railroads must make 6 per cent or higher, no matter if those who are producing the food and clothing and the different forms of production in this country are becoming bankrupt, and are being ruined. Why should not the railroads, if this be an emergency—and we are now attempting to emerge—the stockholders and the bondholders, the owners of the roads, share with the patrons of the roads the burdens of the time of depression, and allow a reasonable rate on freight and passengers, even though they do not make profits sufficient to add betterments and get better equipment? Let each take the other's hand, and let them pass through this American Gethsemane until we get our feet on the ground. But it seems that every organized industry must have its pound of flesh, even though the victim bleeds to death.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is a sound individual proposition, but does the Senator think that the railroads earned too much in 1920? They earned practically nothing.

Mr. SMITH. This is the point; did they earn nothing by virtue of the fact that freight and passenger traffic was not adequate, or was it incidental to the high rate on freight and the high rate in passenger travel and the demoralized condition of the people in reference to industry?

Mr. CUMMINS. They moved more freight in 1920 than the railroads ever moved before in the history of the United States. They carried more passengers in 1920 than they ever carried before in the entire history of railroads. The difficulty was not in the volume of traffic; the difficulty was in the cost of operation and maintenance. I am not here insisting upon an adequate revenue for the railroads. We will not get an adequate revenue for the railroads for years and years to come, in my opinion.

The Senator from South Carolina is a good lawyer and I am sure he will affirm what I say. There is a good deal of difference between men voluntarily consenting to do business for nothing and the Government compelling them to do business for nothing. We can not compel any man to part with his property without just compensation or to give his service without just compensation. Whatever might be the best policy for the railroads themselves to pursue, the Senator from South Carolina knows that we can not compel them to render their service without just compensation.

Mr. SMITH. I recognize that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Supreme Court of the United States has said, over and over again, that so far as the Government is concerned the railroads must have a fair return upon the fair value of their property. We can not compel them to transport either freight or passengers save at such a rate as will yield that fair return. I know the Senator from South Carolina will distinguish between what men ought voluntarily to do and what the Government can compel them to do.

Mr. SMITH. I recognize the force of that argument, Mr. President. I also recognize the responsibility upon us, as the makers of the law, to do the very thing which the Senator from Iowa has indicated, to give them a fair and a just return for the service rendered the public.

We have no way except through the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, based upon information furnished to them by the roads, to know just what are their net earnings. The year 1920 was perhaps unique in that it was the culmination of what were bad conditions preceding. It was abnormal. However, since I, in the committee, heard the reports of the roads as to tonnage and passenger traffic under the increased rates and the net returns, I have been skeptical as to the expenditures that were entered in their balance sheets.

I recognize that in this demoralized condition, coming from Government control into private control, rearranging their car service, getting the matter all straightened out as to the use of their terminals and the expenses incidental to readjustment, all that might have been properly charged against the carrier service to the American public. But the time has arrived now when if we do not take some action such as is contemplated by the proposed measure the period of readjustment will be interminable.

I believe that the psychological effect, aside from the beneficial effect, of the passage of this measure will be to accelerate the adjustment of this controversy between the public and the railroads.

The rates that are being charged are outrageous. Just to refer to something I said the other day in the course of the speech of the Senator from Arkansas, previous to the war a drawing room from Lynchburg, S. C., to Washington cost about $9.50. I do not state the figure definitely, but that approximates it. With the Government tax now eliminated and the surtax alone charged, a drawing room from Lynchburg, S. C., to Washington, D. C., last week cost $19.50 or more.

Mr. ROBINSON. More than twice as much.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; more than twice the former price. A seat in a Pullman car, just the enjoyment of that accommodation, is practically double the former price.

I desire to call attention to one thing the railroads have been allowed to do under the ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission that no man can justify. They have their roads divided into sections and you pay one price on that section of road, a given number of miles, regardless of how far you actually travel. As an illustration: From Florence, S. C., to the capital city, Columbia, is about 80 miles. That is a section of road. You pay for the accommodation plus the surtax 81 cents. From Florence to my country home, Lynchburg, is 19 miles. You pay 81 cents for that distance. From Florence to Timmonsville is 10 miles and the charge is 81 cents. From Florence to any intermediate station you pay 81 cents.

Now we are supposed to live where the charge is adequately proportionate to the goods received, and yet a man boarding the train at Florence, taking advantage of the safety and the convenience and the luxury of a Pullman car, and riding 10 miles, pays as much as if he rode 80 miles.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I suggest that that is not unusual? It is a general thing. I think there is a statute in South Carolina—if not a statute, an order of the State commission—which requires a man to pay 10 cents if he rides but 1 mile in any kind of a car, although the rate is only 3 or 3.6 cents per mile.

Mr. SMITH. There is such a thing as an irreducible minimum. That we all agree to, but that works no hardship. However, no one would stand here, after you get up to where the amount is appreciable and pretty difficult to earn, and say that there was any justification for charging a man as much for 9 miles as for 81 miles.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not an expert with regard to the distribution of passenger rates of that kind, and I do not know just where the line ought to be drawn.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does the Senator think the illustration given by the Senator from South Carolina requires expert knowledge?

Mr. SMITH. I think not. I think I can answer that for the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not prepared to say that a charge of that kind is wrong. I do not know where the line should be drawn. There is always a charge that is disproportionate to the distance traveled if the distance be short. Everybody knows that. It was so before the war, not just as the Senator from South Carolina has stated; but there was a disparity as we all know. Just where the line should be drawn I do not know, and I do not think anybody can tell.

Mr. SMITH. We know that the smallest denomination in our ordinary currency is one cent. That was the irreducible minimum, in our estimation, in our currency. Other nations have less than that, and perhaps some have a greater. But we are all agreed that if anything is worth anything at all it is worth one cent. We may all agree that to ride 1 mile is worth 10 cents, but it is the cumulative thing that is disastrous. We are justified in a small thing like that in fixing a minimum, but to charge as much for riding 10 miles as for riding 81 miles can not be justified. If I had prepared myself on this particular point I could have shown that for longer distances the same disparity obtains.

In my own State that situation prevails. I placed in the RECORD some time ago an incident of a carload of pulp wood shipped from a little station to Sumter, in my State, a distance of about 13 miles. It was a carload of cordwood intended to be shipped to the pulp mills. According to the figures given—and while I speak now from memory, I think I am approximately correct—the freight charge from that little village to Sumter, a distance of 13 miles, was $90. From my own home town to Sumter, a distance of 19 miles, the freight charge was $120. I think the man was to receive for the pulp wood delivered something like $30; so he had the privilege of handing over to the railroad about three times the price of his wood and paying them something to boot for carrying it.

Those are the kinds of things that people suffer from in this chaotic condition. Those are the things that are paralyzing business. The business men of the country are becoming dangerously calloused and indifferent. Men have had hope destroyed. They have looked and waited and longed for some indication of a break in the intolerable conditions they have been called upon to face. There have been chaotic conditions in Europe and chaotic conditions in America, and yet I maintain that here in America, despite the unfortunate conditions that exist in Europe, there was no rhyme nor reason for the American people to be broken and ruined and demoralized and bankrupted because they could not sell their surplus products in Europe. We had in this country sufficient currency and enough produce to permit the processes of trade and commerce to proceed in their completeness and to be sustained by an adequate circulation, so that there was no necessity for the fallacious view that the producers would have to be broken or bankrupted because they could not sell their surplus in Europe. We have gold enough in the Treasury now to issue to the suffering producers of the country credit sufficient to maintain their domestic market and give them a profit, and yet because of the condition of the foreign market they must go bankrupt and be ruined while we insist upon maintaining a splendid basis of credit.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question and a statement?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. On yesterday the Senator from Iowa argued at great length that the net revenues derived by the railroads from present rates are inadequate to enable the railroads to meet even the interest on their bonds. If the present rates are just and reasonable and no increase in revenues can be accomplished by their reduction, how, then, can the railroads ever be provided with revenues adequate to meet the interest on their outstanding obligations? How can we hope that either freight or passenger rates will ever be reduced?

Mr. SMITH. That is the inescapable logic of the argument. If at the present level of freight and passenger charges we can not reduce them without jeopardizing even the interest on their bonded indebtedness and their fixed obligations, what hope is there for the American public that they will ever be reduced to the point where business can function as it should function?

Mr. ROBINSON. The inevitable conclusion, if the Senator will permit me, is that if the public is ever to have relief it must come through a judicious and reasonable and rational reduction of rates.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Arkansas assumes, and his views are approved by the Senator from South Carolina, that all that is the trouble with the world is either a high passenger rate or a high freight rate——

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, Mr. President!

Mr. CUMMINS. That there is nothing else the matter in the world.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator does not wish to make that kind of a statement, surely.

Mr. CUMMINS. It is precisely the conclusion to be drawn from the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, very well!

Mr. CUMMINS. That is, it is the conclusion that I draw.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator is content with that statement, I will say that it carries its own answer and refutation.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely, and if the Senator from Arkansas is content with his statement, it carries its own answer. The world is sick with a great variety of diseases, and high freight rates and high passenger rates may be one of those diseases. I think they do very materially affect the condition of the railroads and of the country.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator from Iowa yield for a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not have the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. I would like to ask the Senator from Iowa if he thinks it is possible to restore vitality and prosperity to American business without a reduction of rates, particularly freight rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do. That question is answered.

Mr. ROBINSON. Oh, the Senator then thinks that the maintenance of the present rates is justified?

Mr. SMITH. May I ask the Senator from Iowa, as he has answered categorically the question of the Senator from Arkansas, how can that be? I would like to have the Senator answer what he thinks would bring about a restoration of business without a reduction of those rates? I will yield in my time for the Senator to answer.

Mr. CUMMINS. If I were to undertake at this time and under these circumstances to state what I believe is wrong with the world and what I think are the necessary remedies to be applied for a restoration of our old-time prosperity, it would require much more time than I think ought to be given to this particular subject.

Mr. SMITH. But I thought, perhaps, as the Senator answered so readily, he had in mind the high points and that in a minute or two he might give us those high points.

Mr. CUMMINS. Suppose the price of corn were $1 a bushel or $1.50 a bushel, our farmers would not lack prosperity on account of high freight rates.

Mr. SMITH. That is good. The Senator has started right.

Mr. CUMMINS. What will make corn worth $1.50 a bushel?

Mr. SMITH. That is the idea.

Mr. CUMMINS. Answer me that.

Mr. SMITH. I will be glad to have the Senator answer that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Freight rates have nothing to do with making corn worth $1.50 a bushel.

Mr. SMITH. But they have a good deal to do——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. Freight rates have a good deal to do with the amount which the farmer receives from the price paid for his corn.

Mr. ROBINSON. Does not that restrict——

Mr. CUMMINS. Wait a moment. If the farmer could sell his product at $1.50 a bushel in my State he would be prosperous even though he paid the present freight rates.

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. I grant that.

Mr. ROBINSON. But if the farmer has to pay the entire or approximate amount of the proceeds of his corn or other products for freight in order to reach the market there can be no prosperity to him.

Mr. CUMMINS. Of course, there can not be.

Mr. ROBINSON. While potatoes, for example, as I said the other day——

Mr. CUMMINS. I thought the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] asked me to state what I thought would restore prosperity to the people of the country.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely wanted——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not willing to accept the answer of the Senator from Arkansas, though I have no doubt he will ultimately give one.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think my statement emphasizes the fact that I am not willing to accept the answer of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly; that is the most natural thing in the world. If corn were worth $1.50 a bushel——

Mr. SMITH. What, in the Senator's opinion, will put corn back to that price?

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. The present low price of corn is brought about because there are a great many people who do not want to buy corn.

Mr. SMITH. People who do not want to buy or can not buy corn?

Mr. CUMMINS. There are not enough people able to consume the corn which we produce.

Mr. SMITH. Why?

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. CUMMINS. Not until I answer the one just asked by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. ROBINSON. I wanted to ask the Senator from Iowa in that connection if he does not know that there are hundreds and thousands of people in the United States and that there are millions of people in the world who are anxious to buy corn at a reasonable price, if it can be transported to them at a reasonable price?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; that is not accurate. There are tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of people who would like to buy corn if they had the money with which to buy it, of course, but they have not the money with which to buy it, and, therefore, the corn which we produce in my State—a very large volume of production, 450,000,000 bushels; as much or more than we ever produced before in the history of the State—finds no market.

The reason it finds no market is because the people are not wanting to buy that much corn. Some of them do not want to buy it for one cause and some for another.

High freight rates in the United States do not produce the trouble in Russia; high freight rates in the United States do not disturb the situation in Germany; high freight rates in the United States do not cause the suffering and starvation in Poland.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will allow me, let us stay in America. I do not want to go over to Russia in this matter.

Mr. CUMMINS. We can not stay entirely in America when we are considering what is wrong with the world and why prices and commodities and wages do not bear the proper relation to each other.

Mr. SMITH. But to get right down to the matter specifically, will the Senator tell me what is the present freight rate on corn from his State to his general market as compared to the prewar freight rate?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not quite twice as much. The general freight rates in this country have from the beginning of the war until the present time been increased about 66 per cent, as the Senator from South Carolina has over and over again stated.

The high freight rates are burdensome, of course. They are burdensome just as high wages are burdensome; they are burdensome just as the high price of prints and of silks and of steel and of every other commodity which rose in price during the war is burdensome. It will require a long time, in my judgment, again to restore the relations between these things which existed before the World War, but we shall gradually do it. To suggest that the high freight rates and the high passenger rates are the cause of all the evils with which we are now afflicted, or of all the suffering which we now experience, is to close our eyes to countless evidences of misadjustment and maladjustment not only throughout our own country but throughout the world. I want to see freight rates go down, but I want the system of transportation which we have built up maintained at the same time. If it is not maintained there will be no possibility of restoring prosperity.

Our system of transportation must be maintained, either through the contributions of those who ride upon our trains or of those who ship upon our railroads, or it must be maintained by the Treasury of the United States. We are passing now through the period of experiment. I do not know whether we can maintain our system of transportation or not; I am afflicted with very grave doubt upon that question; if we can not, there is but one thing to do and that is for the Government of the United States to take over our system of transportation and conduct it in the way in which it thinks will best serve the welfare and the interest of the whole people, and pay whatever is necessary to be paid from the Treasury of the United States, recruited, as the Treasury is constantly recruited, by taxation. That is the real question which we will have to decide before very long.

I am not prepared to say that within a few years it will be necessary for the Government to take over and to own and to operate all our transportation facilities, although it may be. I am fighting against that end, but just such movements as the one initiated in this bill are to me indications that we intend eventually to pass on to Government ownership and Government operation, for, if the Congress of the United States ever enters upon the work, generally speaking, of regulating freight rates and regulating passenger rates, then I hope that very speedily the Government will undertake the further obligation of owning and operating all our transportation facilities.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, so far as the tendency of this bill toward Government ownership is concerned, I have no misgiving. The Interstate Commerce Commission is simply a body possessing the delegated powers of this body——

Mr. ROBINSON. And the responsibility is on Congress.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and the responsibility of whatever the Interstate Commerce Commission may do rests on us, for they are our representatives in a delegated capacity. So that argument has no force with me.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a brief statement?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. I was impressed with the rather one-sided view, if I may be permitted to use that expression without offense, of the Senator from Iowa when he undertook to diagnose the ills from which we suffer. Everybody is now contending, for instance, that there is a shortage of homes, of roofs to shelter our people. In my own particular State we produce lumber, and yet, because the freight rates will not permit them to ship it, the mills are now burning in their furnaces lumber that would sell in the market to-day at as high a price as $24 a thousand. They are burning enough material in the sawmills of this country now to build homes for 100,000 people. Good building material, building material that formerly commanded a fair price in the market, can not be shipped at all because the railroad charges eat it up. I know of a branch railroad in my State, nearly 100 miles long, whose principal industry was hauling hardwood products, which has practically been forced into bankruptcy because the price of freight on the materials that it formerly shipped has been so boosted that they can not be carried at all, and the mills, as I have said, are burning in their furnaces lumber that formerly commanded a good price.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. They are not only burning lumber in the South, but they are burning corn in the West.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, there is not any use to attempt to beg the question or to seek to find any other excuse or any other reason, for the fact is that the stagnation in our business is mainly due to prohibitive freight rates. I am glad the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] mentioned lumber. Let us take it as an illustration. From my State just a few months ago a carload of lumber, I understand, was shipped either to Philadelphia or New York—I do not remember now to which city the consignment was shipped. The price paid delivered let us say was $32 a thousand feet, while the freight was approximately $22. Is that justifiable? Is it justifiable that on a given kind of lumber—and I am merely approximating the figures, but the relativity of the figures that I am giving is maintained although the exact amounts may not be those recorded—selling for $32 a thousand feet delivered, $22 a thousand should be charged for freight? Is it conceivable that all the operations from the time that nature produced the tree, including the effort of the man who sawed it down, the team that hauled it to the mill, the men who erected the sawmill and fabricated the engines, and all the other forms of activity involved in the transformation of energy and manipulation of the machinery essential to get that log on the bed and saw it into lumber, and put it aboard a car were worth but one-third of what it was worth to haul it by an engine from Florence, S. C., to Philadelphia? Yet it is said that freight rates having nothing to do with discouraging and prohibiting industry, although corn, ton for ton, is selling in the Dakotas for less than coal, and 5,000,000 people out of a job, idle and starving, are walking the streets in America begging for bread.

The Senator from Iowa stated that the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from South Carolina charged this condition up to the high freight rates. No; but in the carrying on of commerce transportation is one of the essential factors, and we have got to remedy the evils that exist in that factor, and remedy them at once.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. How does the Senator propose to bring about a reduction in railroad rates?

Mr. SMITH. I will use an illustration. I think one of the best things that could possibly be done would be for Congress, which has the power over the Interstate Commerce Commission, to direct that body to lower freight rates a certain percentage, that percentage to be governed very largely by the current of the average cost of material now as compared to the time when the rates were increased.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If the railroads earned nothing, and we reduce the rates, what is to become of the railroads?

Mr. SMITH. The railroads would be in no worse fix than the public is in now, because if the rates are maintained as they are now the economic and commercial condition of this country is going to go from bad to worse.

Let me say to the Senator from Indiana, that when I talk about the conditions that are acute now, that are destroying men now, I am met with this: "Oh, you just keep your shirt on. You just wait. These things will all adjust themselves in the future. Give us time and we will work out a plan sometime. We have not discovered it so far, but we will yet."

A man suffering from cancer goes to a doctor, or a man suffering from some other disease that is killing him right now. The doctor says, "Just keep your shirt on. After you are dead and gone perhaps we will find something that will be a specific for that disease"; but he wants something to help him now, and he can not wait until science has discovered some way to cure the disease.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not want the Senator to break in until I finish my line of questions. If the year before the Adamson law was passed railroad wages amounted to $1,400,000,000 a year, and last year they amounted to $3,700,000,000—an increase of over $2,000,000,000 in wages alone—how does the Senator expect to reduce operating expenses without a reduction of wages?

Mr. SMITH. The question is this——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; how does the Senator expect to do that?

Mr. SMITH. I would begin to analyze the whole scale of the pay that is given to those who operate our railroads. We have assumed that though the railroads are privately owned, we have a right to say how much they shall earn. If we have a right to fix the hours of labor and the wages, why have we not a right to indicate what shall be the revenue to meet certain excessive charges along other lines?

The Senator is trying to get me to say that I believe that the wages paid ought to be arbitrarily reduced and the hours of labor increased. When it comes to the men who operate our railroads, who take all the risks—for it is a hazardous line of employment, even in the roundhouses, and on the railroads it is hard and menial work—I am not going to say that their wages ought to be reduced. I believe that the wages paid are just and adequate. I believe that the amount received by the roads on freight and passenger traffic is out of all line with what they could earn, even now, with the present tonnage, if they would reduce their freight and passenger rates to a level sufficient to invite commerce and to invite travel.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, may I ask a question there?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let the Senator ask his question, and then I will ask another one.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; I will wait until the Senator has finished.

Mr. SMITH. Just let me ask the Senator a question. His party is in power, and I infer from the question the Senator asked me that he thinks that ought to be done. The Senator's party certainly have power to repeal the Adamson law if they think that is one of the causes of the present condition.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If I had my way about it, I would repeal the Adamson law. There is not any question about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Adamson law is repealed, in effect.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But the Adamson law is a dead issue, so far as that is concerned, because it does not operate. I will tell the Senator my remedy, so far as that part of it is concerned, in just a word.

We have a Railway Labor Board to regulate wages. We have an Interstate Commerce Commission to regulate rates. That is to say, we have two agencies dealing with the same instrumentality, but in reality with no point of contact between the two; and yet, when we get down to the basic facts of the matter, the Railway Labor Board, while having jurisdiction over the subject of wages, in reality can compel certain rates to be put into effect, because when they fix wages the Interstate Commerce Commission must make rates that will meet those wages. It has seemed to me that there ought to be some cooperation between the two bodies.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, some of us insisted when the Cummins-Esch bill was before us that the power to fix wages should be placed in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for the reasons that are now being stated in the suggestions of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not any doubt about that, and have not had.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana voted against that proposition, and voted for the Esch-Cummins bill, and voted against the proposition just stated by the Senator from Utah, when he wanted to put it in, which the Senator now says is the correct idea.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; but this was the situation at that time: When the Esch-Cummins bill passed the Senate that board was differently constituted from the way it is constituted now. We had five men, all appointed by the President, representing the general public. The House, however, amended the bill. They wanted three members representing labor exclusively, three representing management exclusively, and three representing the public exclusively.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator voted for that. When the bill came in from the conference, the Senator voted for that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I voted for that because it was that or nothing. Now, listen to me: The Senator understands how these legislative exigencies arise.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, I do; and I see how Senators change.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly. When conference reports are made the Senator knows very well that they can not be changed in order to alter one feature of a bill. The result is that when a controversy comes before the Railway Labor Board you have three advocates representing labor, you have three advocates representing management, and you have three judges. You have six lawyers on your board and three judges.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not our board. It is the Senator's board, because the Senator's party created it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator now wants to get into politics about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Senator is calling it our board, and it is not our board.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I understand all about that. We were responsible for the legislation, of course——

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, surely.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And I accept the responsibility.

Mr. CARAWAY. Do not talk about the Adamson law, then.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Hold on a minute.

Mr. SMITH. I yield, under orders. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator yield until I get through?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, I will; under orders.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What I wanted to see done was to get the two instrumentalities cooperating, working side by side, so that at a given time, having previously arranged that wages might be reduced a certain per cent, immediately afterwards rates could be reduced correspondingly, the whole thing having been studied out in advance, and the men on the railroads who are doing the railroad work themselves would have shared in the benefits of the reduction. I do not believe that it is possible to reduce railroad rates in the United States without a reduction in the wages paid.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator permit me to call his attention to the fact that the board of which he is now complaining has already reduced wages, but the commission which he is upholding has not reduced rates?

Mr. CUMMINS. That last remark is hardly accurate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Why, it has reduced rates in over 5,000 cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, it may have equalized rates, but it has not reduced freight rates, as we all know. Let us not blind ourselves to the facts. We know that freight rates have gone up over 100 per cent and in many cases 200 per cent, and that substantially there has been no reduction; but we know that the same board of which the Senator is now complaining has voted a reduction in the wages of labor.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of 12 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we could get a 12 per cent reduction in freight rates, we would feel that we had done something.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; I have not any doubt about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. You have it, and more.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; and more than that. It is useless for the Senator to stand up here and say: "Oh, all we have to do is just to wave a wand and reduce freight rates." That does not settle the problem. We have got to permit the railroads to secure enough revenue to run and pay their expenses, or the whole thing will collapse. How does my friend from South Carolina expect to assist the business of the country by breaking up the railroads, simply because other people are broken up?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana can not infer from what I have said that we are going to break up the railroads.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But the Senator said a moment ago that other people were broken, and that there was distress throughout the country, and that there was no reason why the railroads should not come into the same condition.

Mr. SMITH. No; I said there was no reason why the railroads should not contribute to the relief of the distress that exists throughout the country.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Precisely; and yet in 1920 they did not earn a dollar. How are you going to get below nothing?

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me just a moment, I should like to say that in my judgment the fact that they did not earn anything was in large measure due to the rates that were received, which were out of all proportion, and such as to stop business. If the Congress would direct or permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce rates, the volume of business of the railroads would be increased to such an extent that their net revenues must inevitably be greater than they are now. We all know that that is true. If you increase the volume of business of the railroads, you are going to have prosperous railroads; and without an increased volume of business you can not have prosperity.

Mr. CUMMINS. As I remarked a few minutes ago, the volume of business, both freight and passenger, in the year of which the Senator from Tennessee is speaking, was greater than in any other year in the history of the United States.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, all the arguments finally resolve themselves into this proposition that confronts the American people, and we here must answer it: Either the price of the material that the people are producing must rise to a point where they can pay the present freight rates and show a profit, or the freight rates must come down to a point where the present level of prices will allow the people to do business. It is an inescapable logical situation at which we have arrived.

You must bring transportation and commodities to a point where the market price received will show a profit, or business will cease; and it has well-nigh ceased throughout the country. I, for one, am going to take the risk, if it is a risk, of voting for this bill as amended, or voting for it without amendment, on the ground that this will be at least a tangible evidence that those whom the people have charged with the responsibility of taking care of these affairs have taken cognizance of their distressed condition, and are going to do something to relieve it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would the Senator from South Carolina be willing to vote for a bill which would fix the wages of engineers, of firemen, of trainmen, of switchmen, and of all the other employees of the railroad companies?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, not being a great constitutional lawyer I will risk a suggestion made to me, that in the first place I could hide behind the answer that the Constitution would not let me do it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not speaking of constitutional power.

Mr. SMITH. I would never vote for any law that would fix the value of a man's personal effort, but I will vote for a law which will fix interest on money and on things which the public uses.

Mr. CUMMINS. If we in Congress attempt to fix by a direct vote the revenues of the railroads, we must in some way by a direct vote attempt to fix the expenses of the railroads. We can not deal with one subject without at the same time dealing with the other, it seems to me.

Mr. SMITH. I understand you run up against that human equation in this proposition, that here is a man, and you can not treat him and the service he renders and the faithfulness of his work as you can a yard of calico or a pound of steel. But we can, in common sense and reason, begin now and make a tentative effort to bring down this intolerable, towering freight rate, and give the people to understand that we are earnestly trying and will ultimately succeed. We are not in swaddling clothes, and we are not infants. We can find a way by which adequate transportation can be furnished the people at a reasonable cost, and it is our duty to begin now, and I am going to begin to-day.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if there is any foundation for the assertion that the Interstate Commerce Commissoin and the Labor Board both proceed with a little too great deliberation in these important matters?

Mr. SMITH. I am not prepared to answer, Mr. President, what the cause of this delay is. I do state that it is a crime for us to find no way by which the general public can be relieved, while certain privileged classes are enjoying the high tide that reached and leaped over us during the war. Everything is deflated, everything is put down upon a basis of bankruptcy, while certain interests are still maintaining the incomes and the prices obtaining during the war, and I for one, though I do not belong to the majority party, using the best judgment I have, am going to vote and work for those things which will at least give some measure of relief to those upon whom the burden rests to furnish the bread and the meat and the clothing and the materials which the American people depend upon.

Mr. CARAWAY. Following the suggestion of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], does it not impress the Senator that it takes so much less time to raise the rates than to lower them, that sometimes the people's patience is a little bit tried?

Mr. SMITH. Surely.

Mr. CARAWAY. They can raise them almost overnight, and then it takes years to find out that it is just to lower them.

Mr. SMITH. That is a fact. Mr. President, I have taken a longer time than I should have taken. I have voiced my feeling about this matter. I, together with others, am a victim of this unfortunate condition, and the American people are not going to tolerate us sitting down and saying, "We know that the freight rates are so high that you can not ship with any profit, but we must maintain a good income to the railroads." "What about me, producing the stuff that is making the railroads possible?" "You will have to take your chances; that is all. Just do the best you can."

Mr. CARAWAY. Before the Senator sits down let me just call his attention to a statement that was made here the other day, that what are known as packer cattle, full-grown cows, were shipped from one of the Western States—I am rather inclined to think it was Montana or Wyoming—down to Dallas, Tex.—full-grown cows—and after they paid the freight charges they brought the owners of the cattle 54 cents a head; in other words, the railroad companies got everything but 54 cents for a full-grown cow, 3 or 4 years old.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, every patriotic American citizen ought to be willing to go into bankruptcy, if necessary, to make the railroads a profit. He is not in business for the purpose of making himself a profit, but for maintaining the transportation system, and the sooner we learn that the better for us.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the following order be entered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the request.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent that, at not later than 5 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day, Saturday, January 21, 1922, the Senate shall proceed to vote, without further debate, on the bill S. 848 and on all amendments thereto that may be pending or that may be offered. No amendment not germane to the bill shall be considered, and after the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. on said day no amendment shall be offered, and no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I am not sure that I am going to object, but I can not see the necessity of fixing the hour as late as 5 o'clock on Saturday afternoon. I would make it 2 o'clock, or at the latest 3, and we can meet earlier.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, while the Senator from Oregon was out of the Chamber I submitted a request for consent that a final vote be taken at not later than 3 o'clock, and it was objected to. However, I think the hour for a final vote may be moved forward, and I will modify the request.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I suggest that the Senator change the hour for a final vote from 5 to 3, and the hour when debate shall be limited from 3 to 1.

Mr. ROBINSON. I accept that suggestion. I will modify the request so that it will read as follows:

That at not later than 3 o'clock p. m. on the calendar day, Saturday, January 21, 1922, the Senate shall proceed to vote, without further debate, on the bill S. 848 and on all amendments thereto that may be pending or that may be offered. No amendment not germane to the bill shall be considered; and after the hour of 1 o'clock p. m. on said day no amendment shall be offered and no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto. That the Senate, when it recesses to-day, shall take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. What is the hour fixed for a vote?

Mr. ROBINSON. Three o'clock. I think it entirely probable, I will say to the Senator from Wyoming, that under this agreement a vote may be reached earlier.

Mr. WARREN. Is not the Senator willing, as he asks to have an earlier hour for meeting, to put that forward and make it 2 o'clock?

Mr. ROBINSON. I am willing to do so if the Senate will agree to it. I will make it read that at not later than 2 o'clock a vote shall be taken. That will give three hours for debate. I submit it in that form.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, as I understand the request, it really prohibits the offering of any amendment after 1 o'clock and gives two hours during which any amendments which may be pending or offered at 1 o'clock can be considered. That to a great extent meets the objection I made to the other request. I think that will probably give ample time for the consideration of amendments. I do not know whether one hour would give ample time or not. There might be half a dozen amendments pending at 1 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON. At the suggestion of Senators about me, including the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], I have moved back the hour from 1 o'clock to 12 o'clock, so as to give two hours, between 12 and 2 o'clock, for the discussion and disposition of amendments which may be pending.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will not make any objection to that, although I would rather no time were fixed for the final vote on the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will ask to have the order entered in this form:

That at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day Saturday, January 21, 1922, the Senate shall proceed to vote, without further debate, on the bill S. 848 and on all amendments thereto that may be pending or that may be offered. No amendment not germane to the bill shall be considered, and after the hour of 12 o'clock p. m. on said day no amendment shall be offered, and no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto. That the Senate, when it recesses to-day, shall take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas asks that the Senate enter into a unanimous-consent agreement, upon which it is necessary to call the roll. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harris	McNary	Sheppard
Bursum	Harrison	Moses	Simmons
Capper	Johnson	Newberry	Smith
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Swanson
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Trammell
Curtis	Kellogg	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	Kenyon	Poindexter	Warren
Fernald	Ladd	Pomerene	Watson, Ind.
Harreld	McKellar	Robinson	Williams

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. WATSON] on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Assistant Secretary called the names of the absent Senators and Mr. LA FOLLETTE, Mr. NELSON, Mr. ODDIE, Mr. PHIPPS, Mr. SHIELDS, Mr. SUTHERLAND, and Mr. WALSH of Montana answered to their names when called.

Mr. BROUSSARD, Mr. CAMERON, Mr. WELLER, Mr. SPENCER, Mr. PAGE, Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. GOODING, Mr. OWEN, Mr. FLETCHER, and Mr. STANFIELD entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the pending bill——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on entering into the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CURTIS. Let it be reported.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Withholding my consent to the agreement, it will only take me a moment for what I have to say.

Mr. CURTIS. That might require the calling of the roll again to ascertain if a quorum is present. We have just had the roll called, and if the Senator would just as soon wait until we have entered into the unanimous consent it would avoid another call of the roll.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I prefer to proceed now. I shall only take a moment. I do not think it will involve the calling of the roll again. I do not know what the request for unanimous consent is.

Mr. President, the pending bill provides for the issuing of interchangeable, nontransferrable 5,000-mile tickets to be sold at the rate of 2½ cents a mile, and it contains a provision that the Interstate Commerce Commission—shall modify the rate established by this paragraph whenever, in its opinion, there is, after this paragraph takes effect, a substantial alteration in the average rate level for the transportation of persons by such carriers throughout the country as a whole, so as to increase or decrease such rate directly in proportion, as nearly as the commission deems practicable, to such alteration in such average rate level.

It is objected that the bill is class legislation in the interest of traveling men, or commercial travelers, as they are called. I fail to see on what that objection is based, inasmuch as these special-rate mileage tickets are purchasable by anybody who chooses to take advantage of them. It is to be universal in its operation.

It is said, however, that in effect, by reason of the fact that men whose business requires them to spend a great portion of their time in traveling would be the ones who would utilize the privileges conferred by this act, it would operate to give them a lower rate of transportation than is given to other people, and consequently it would be unjust discrimination and violative of what ought to be the fundamental rule of rate making.

Mr. President, the complete answer to that objection is that at the present time, under the present rates and under the present regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission and under the law, the railroads are selling special railroad tickets with special terms and special provisions at a lower rate than 2½ cents a mile. My attention was called to one form of ticket that may be bought by anybody who may choose to take the trip, and I have no doubt there are many other routes covered by tickets of the same kind.

An all-year-round tourist ticket is sold, say, at Chicago upon a route beginning at Chicago, thence to Minneapolis, from there to Butte, thence to Seattle, to Sacramento, to San Francisco, to Los Angeles, to El Paso, to New Orleans, to Memphis, and back to Chicago, a total distance of 6,719 miles. This ticket is sold for the total sum of $162.39. The ticket is good for nine months and the rate per mile is 2.4 cents, which is a lower rate than that which is provided for in the pending measure.

It is not objected to as being discriminatory in favor of any class or as favoring or giving a privilege to any particular class to utilize the ticket or as giving a lower rate of transportation to any one class of people against another. Anyone who wants to take a tourist trip and wants to engage in that kind of travel has the opportunity to buy tickets at that rate, and the same identical price applies to it as would apply to the 5,000-mile ticket of universal interchangeable character provided for in the bill.

From the standpoint of the business of the country and of the railroads themselves, it is estimated that the enactment of this measure would lead immediately to the receipt by the railroad companies of a vast sum of money, variously estimated at from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. Nobody can tell how much it would be, but it would be a very large sum which the railroads would immediately receive in advance for transportation provided for through the medium of these tickets. The advantage to the railroads of that realization in cash for their potential and future service can readily be seen. It is obvious to everybody.

There is another aspect of the bill to which I wish to call attention, and that is the incentive it would give to increased travel by men engaging in travel for business purposes and for the purpose of putting goods upon the market. It would create new business, increase transportation in the country, and consequently benefit the railroads as well as those engaged in industry. So it seems to me that the objections which are made to the bill are completely answered by the existing practices of the roads and by the perfectly obvious beneficial result which would come to the roads from the addition of this particular class of tickets to those which are already on sale.

I am very much in favor of the measure as it is. I regard it as an extremely meritorious measure.

It is said by a great many people that Congress is not in any situation to fix a passenger rate, because it has not the requisite knowledge. The only knowledge that we have is the experience and the practice of the country. I have cited an instance, already in practice, of a rate even lower than that provided in the bill, which is given to the purchasers of certain kinds of tickets. So we can assume that as a standard by which we can be guided in authorizing under somewhat similar conditions the wholesale disposal of transportation and the fixing of a rate which by comparison we can say is perfectly reasonable as tested out by the practice and experience of the transportation companies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed unanimous-consent agreement will be read as modified.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that at not later than 2 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Saturday, January 21, 1922, the Senate will proceed to vote, without further debate, upon any amendment that may be pending, any amendment that may be offered, and upon the bill S. 848, to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act, permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes, through the regular parliamentary stages to its final disposition; that no amendment not germane shall be considered, and that after the hour of 12 o'clock m. on said calendar day no amendment shall be offered and no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and, further, that when the Senate concludes the business of this day it will take a recess until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on entering into the unanimous-consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I am glad this bill is under consideration by the Senate and hope that it is going to be passed. I hope that this bill as reported by the committee will be passed, rather than the so-called Cummins substitute, which I shall refer to hereafter. I wish now to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that as early as May, 1919, I introduced a bill of similar character for the issuance of mileage books. I ask permission to insert that bill in my remarks without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The bill referred to is as follows:

A bill (S. 60) authorizing the Director General of Railroads to establish a system of mileage books.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Director General of Railroads be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to fix and establish a system of mileage books at a rate not exceeding 20 per cent less than the rates already fixed for the use of commercial travelers and others habitually using the railroads.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Since that date, May 20, 1919, I have introduced a number of bills and amendments seeking to bring about the issuance of mileage books along the same lines as the bill now before us. It will be recalled when the tax bill was under consideration in November I introduced the following amendment:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. MCKELLAR to the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes, viz: On page 171, after line 25, insert the following:

"Section 22 of the interstate commerce act is amended by inserting '(1)' after the section number at the beginning of such section and by striking out all after the first proviso of such section and inserting at the end of such section two new paragraphs to read as follows:

"(2) Each common carrier by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, within the continental United States subject to this act, shall issue interchangeable nontransferable 2,000-mile tickets (including the privilege of carrying baggage free to the amount of 100 pounds), to be sold at the rate of 2½ cents a mile, for transportation of persons on any lines of such carrier or any other such carrier, without regard as to whether the points of origin and destination for any single journey are within the same State, provided such carrier is engaged in interstate commerce. The commission, by order, (a) may initiate and establish such classifications, regulations, and practices relating to such tickets, (b) may make such regulation as it deems necessary for the enforcement of the provisions of this paragraph, and (c) shall modify the rate established by this paragraph whenever in its opinion there is, after this paragraph takes effect, a substantial alteration in the average rate level for the transportation of persons by such carriers throughout the country as a whole, so as to increase or decrease such rate directly in proportion, as nearly as the commission deems practicable, to such alteration in such average rate level and without regard to section 15a of the interstate commerce act, as amended by section 422 of the transportation act approved February 28, 1920. Any ticket unused in whole or in part at the time of any such modification may be redeemed at the same rate per mile as that for which it was purchased. No common carrier shall demand, collect, or receive greater or less compensation for the transportation of persons or baggage under any such 2,000-mile ticket than that required by the provisions of this paragraph or any order of the commission issued thereunder or refuse to accept any such ticket for the transportation of persons as provided in this paragraph.

"(3) If any provision of paragraph (2) or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of such paragraph and the application of such provision to other persons and circumstances shall not be affected thereby, and no tax shall be imposed upon mileage tickets issued under this paragraph."

Mr. President, it will be seen that the foregoing amendment is substantially the same as the present Watson bill reported out by the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce. Indeed, as I recall, I simply offered Senator WATSON's bill. At that time a motion was made to lay my amendment on the table and our good friends on the other side, including Senator WATSON, voted to lay the amendment on the table. It was the same amendment that they have since reported favorably to the Senate. I congratulate Senator WATSON and our friends on the other side generally on their change of mind and on reporting out the bill of the Senate, and I hope they will now pass this long-delayed and beneficial measure. Their change of heart on this subject of mileage books is very pronounced, and I hope it will be maintained until this measure is safely passed. I hope they will not agree to the Cummins substitute. The Interstate Commerce Committee, of course, knows my consistent and active efforts for more than two years to get an amendment reported out of that committee. I have no pride of authorship about it. I simply believed the legislation ought to be enacted, and I am, of course, greatly pleased at the present prospect of its passage.

Mr. President, there are several defects in the present bill which ought to be corrected. There are several amendments which ought to be agreed to. One is that tickets issued should be 1,000-mile instead of 5,000-mile tickets. The provision in Senator CUMMINS's substitute on the subject of not less than 1,000 miles nor more than 5,000 miles is all right. Of course, there should be an amendment as to the unused portion of the books. They should be redeemable, and I can see no reason why the books should not be transferable.

These amendments will certainly aid in increasing travel, and I believe they are to the best interest of the railroads and the public. One thousand mile tickets were the kind which were usually issued by railroad companies when such transportation was available before the World War, and I believe it would be wise to require the issuance of such tickets now.

Mr. President, the necessity of this legislation, it would seem to me, would be obvious to anyone. It is claimed that the Interstate Commerce Commission should be left alone to remedy the situation that everybody knows exists. On the other hand, it is claimed that the commission—and I believe that a portion of the commission claims itself—that it has not the legal authority to direct that mileage books be sold. I have serious doubt about the authority myself. At all events, it can not hurt to give them the authority. Nor can it hurt to give specific directions about it. It seems to me, from the statements made here on the floor, that the commission is divided about evenly on the wisdom of directing mileage books to be issued. If that is the situation, there could be no reason why Congress could not express its views, especially when the situation is as obvious as it is.

We are not seeking, Mr. President, to put any new or untried policy upon the railroads. We are simply readopting that wise policy that the railroads themselves had followed for many years prior to Government control. If it had not been a wise policy, they would have themselves done away with it. If it had not been profitable, they would not have used it. If it had not been to their best interests, they would not have operated under it. For this reason, therefore, the system ought to be reestablished as one that has been tried and found good. In the next place, it is in another respect obviously for the best interest of the railroads. The undisputed proof is that business firms have had greatly to decrease their number of commercial travelers because of the excessive rates. Now, when we remember that every commercial traveler in this country is not only a traveler for the particular business which employs him, but is a business getter for the railroads as well, we must see the importance to the railroads themselves of adding to the number of commercial travelers in this country. Every time a drummer sells a bill of goods for his house he also sells transportation to the railroads. Not only his own transportation but transportation for the goods which he sells. In other words, if we had to-day three times as many traveling men on the road as there are, and they sold three times as many goods as they do to-day, the railroads would get substantially three times as much business to haul from that source as they do now. Every drummer in the United States is a drummer for the railroads also. Under these circumstances it seems to me a wholly misguided self-interest on the part of railroads when they do not welcome the sale of mileage books.

Mr. President, of course, the sale of these tickets will greatly advantage the public. The enormous cost of travel must necessarily keep many from traveling that would travel, and under well-known economic rules we know that railroads depend for their prosperity upon the volume of business done rather than upon the height of the rate. These books will unquestionably bring about an increase in travel, and for the same overhead greater revenues could be made from a lower passenger rate. This was demonstrated yesterday in the figures presented by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. In addition, Mr. President, the sale of these books will immediately put the railroads in possession of a large amount of cash which they admittedly need at this time.

Mr. President, the passage of this bill and the sale of these mileage books will greatly benefit the business of the country. The business of the country is at a low ebb. Business men are doubtful of the future. Their taxes are high, their tariff duties are high, all out of proportion to the amount of business they are doing. We should get back on a reasonable basis. We should get back to a condition of affairs that will make them safe in enlarging and extending their business. The more traveling men we can put upon the roads the more we do for the business of the country and the more we do for the railroads. There is an imperative demand all over the country for this decrease of rates.

Mr. President, we have tried the enormously high rates, and neither the railroads nor the business public have prospered. Let us try these rates and at the same time see its effect on business and its effect on the railroads. No one wishes to handicap the railroads. We want to see them prosper. We want to see them make much more money than they have in the past. I would like to see every railroad in the country prosper, but I believe the policy they are now attempting of holding on to these enormous rates brought about by the war is a suicidal policy and one that they should not continue.

Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] a while ago said in the year 1920 the railroads had the largest volume of business ever handled by them. That may be true, but the volume of business should increase steadily, and this legislation will cause it to increase. When it is increased, the net revenues of the railroads, in my judgment, coming from passenger travel at 2½ cents a mile will be larger than the net revenues which are now received from the 3.6 cents per mile. If it had not been to the best interest of the railroads to operate under a mileage-book system, manifestly they would not have done so when the matter was all in their hands. They found it profitable or they would not have engaged in it.

Mr. President, I digress here long enough to ask the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is jointly interested in the bill, if he would not agree to an amendment to make the mileage books which are to be sold under the provisions of this proposed act good for not exceeding 5,000 and for not less than 1,000 miles?

Mr. ROBINSON. I would be glad to accept an amendment, so far as I am concerned, making the minimum 2,000 miles; but I hardly think we ought to make it 1,000 miles, under the facts as they have developed during the discussion.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Well, Mr. President, at the proper time, if an amendment reducing the minimum to 1,000 miles, as was the case before the war, is not offered I shall myself offer one of that character.

Mr. President, just a word about freight rates. We all know there is something the matter with business. It is at an extremely low ebb. In my own judgment, one of the things—I do not think it is the only thing—that is the matter with business is that freight rates are so high as to shut off business. Not only do the present high rates curtail business but in many instances farmers, manufacturers, and other producers are unable to ship their products at all because of the excessive freight rates which absolutely destroy business. I think it would be unfair to say that a reduction in rates, either passenger or freight rates, or both, would be a cure-all for all we are suffering. I do not think so, but I do think nothing would stimulate the business of the country more than a reduction of rates. The reduction of passenger rates would stimulate business because business houses could then send out their drummers to sell their goods in the various markets, and when drummers are active they not only increase the business of the firms they represent but they also increase the earnings of the railroads, because, as I have previously stated, every drummer is a drummer for the railroads as well as for his own house.

Now, as to freight rates, there have been many illustrations offered to show their blighting effect upon business. We know that in many instances business has been practically stopped because of freight rates. In many instances freight rates are so high that they amount to sums greater than those for which the products themselves sell. Something must be done to remedy such a condition. It seems to me that we should make a start, and the bill now under consideration asking passenger rates will constitute such a start. So let us try it.

It is argued that we can not reduce freight and passenger rates as long as wages are so high. We all know that the Railroad Labor Board has reduced the rates of railroad wages 12 per cent. In addition to this, the cost of railroad materials has greatly depreciated, and yet there has been no substantial reduction in rates. While there have been reductions in individual cases, as stated by the Senator from Iowa, there have probably been increases in as many or more cases. I know there have been considerable increases in rates on transportation for road materials.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to say that I have no kind of antipathy toward the railroads. I know how important they are in building up and maintaining commerce and trade of this country. I want them to be successful. If they are prosperous, the country will be prosperous. I want them to have every right and privilege. I would benefit them rather than injure them.

I would build them up rather than tear them down, but I believe they have been operating for some time under a mistaken policy. They have departed from the policy of basing their rates on what the traffic will bear and they are making a system of rates as high as they can pile them. The result is that they have not been as successful as they were before. They are not progressing as they should. They are not increasing their business. They are not earning dividends as they should. They are not keeping pace with their opportunities. We should do something for their benefit, and I believe the passage of the pending bill and the passage of a bill directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce freight rates—not a tremendous reduction, coming all at once, but a substantial and gradual reduction—will do more to restore prosperity in this country than any other act of Congress we could pass. I say this not only for the benefit of the general public who use the railroads but quite as much for the railroads themselves. They have raised rates so high as to injure themselves and the country. We ought to reduce the rates in such a way as to restore the business of the country and bring about the prosperity of the railroads themselves. We can not make a better start than by enacting the bill as reported out by the committee with the amendments I have suggested.

Mr. President, I desire to offer another suggestion. It has been stated that the bill is unconstitutional. The Supreme Court by a divided vote held such a view in the Michigan Central Railroad case, One hundred and seventy-third United States. My understanding of course is, since that decision was made by our court the Supreme Court has modified its views very greatly, and that under such modified opinion of the Supreme Court this bill is constitutional, and I believe it to be constitutional.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator give the reference to the opinion?

Mr. McKELLAR. I refer to the decision in the case of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. v. Towers (245 U. S., p. 6). I will be glad to submit the volume to the Senator.

If it is a constitutional measure, and I think it is, let us try it. Let us see what can be done. We have tried the high rates under the Esch-Cummins law, and the railroads have not prospered and the country has not prospered. Let us try decreased rates and see if they will not increase the volume of business for the railroads and the prosperity of the country. I think it is as little as we can do. If we are mistaken about it, the Congress can correct it; but I, for one, believe we will not only aid the railroads but the public to a tremendous degree.

Mr. President, one other word about the Cummins substitute. I do not believe that the passage of the Cummins substitute will relieve the situation. It may or it may not. It would possibly be better than nothing, but it would simply be a direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission to examine into the matter. It could hardly be called an expression of opinion by the Congress. I hope the substitute may not be agreed to, but the bill as reported out, with amendments as suggested by me, may pass.

PROPOSED FEDERAL RESERVE FOREIGN BANK.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President and gentlemen of the Senate, I again call the attention of my colleagues, and especially of my Republican colleagues, and appeal to them to consider the proposal I submitted January 4, Senate bill 2915. Action on this subject promptly is of vital importance to our foreign commerce. It offers an important means to restore the value of our agricultural and manufactured commodities, to relieve our industrial depression, to engage our unemployed labor, to stimulate the industrial activities of Europe, to enable Europe to buy our commodities, to assist Europe to repay us the loans we made to England, France, Italy, Rumania, Belgium, and Russia.

The bill proposes to give Europe the wonderful benefits which we receive and enjoy from the wise and sound principles of the Federal reserve act and the enormous gold supply we have built up under that system; that there shall be established a Federal reserve foreign bank for European operations, with $500,000,000 gold capital, owned by our 12 Federal reserve banks, with power to issue $2,500,000,000 in bank notes—denominations, $1, $5, $10, $20, $50, $100, $1,000, and $10,000—to be issued against 100 per cent sound short-term bankers' bills, secured by 100 per cent of staple, merchantable, insured commodities, title covered by documents, with a 20 per cent gold reserve for redemption purposes, redeemable in gold at London, Paris, and Berlin by member banks only; that such bank should lend such currency notes against such bankers' bills, and thus furnish the people for till money and pocket money, and to the banks of Europe $2,500,000,000 of gold bank notes as a currency with which to measure business contracts and afford a stable measure of value in buying, selling, and contracting for the manufacture and delivery of commodities.

The most vital financial need of Europe is a dependable, stable international currency as a medium of exchange. America alone at this time is able to furnish such a currency, as America alone has the gold. We alone have the available gold.

We have 35 per cent gold reserves, against $1,784,000,000 of deposits of member banks, equal to $634,400,000, which is idle, useless, and unproductive, because the deposits can not, except in case of an occasional bankruptcy, be withdrawn under the statute, and could be paid in reserve notes even if the deposits of an insolvent bank were withdrawn. We can use $500,000,000 of this unproductive gold and still leave the Federal reserve notes with 100 per cent of gold for redemption purposes.

The Bank of England during the Great War, although the bulwark of Great Britain's financial structure, got down to 8 per cent reserve without creating any financial disturbance.

It will be very profitable. These loans of $2,500,000,000 of bank notes would approximately pay 3 per cent, or $75,000,000. gold annually, and expand the service to the extent of European requirements.

The one great overwhelming need of Europe is a money equal in value to gold, and as stable as gold, in the pockets of the people, in the tills of the merchants, manufacturers, business men, and bankers.

Buyers and sellers with a fluctuating currency are terribly handicapped. The buyer finds the mark buys less in commodities as the mark falls in value, so that his money is losing value all the time. The seller finds his commodities bring marks of less gold value as the mark falls. When he tries to save himself by raising the price in terms of marks it is to his disadvantage in selling. When he receives the marks for his goods, before he can buy new commodities the mark has again fallen in gold value. He suffers both ways. Measuring contracts by a fluctuating currency is like measuring silk cloth with a rubber yardstick; like selling oil by the can without defining the size of the can; buying coal by the bucket without knowing the size of the bucket.

It is chaos, hopeless confusion. Under such conditions the manufacturer, merchant, and business man is almost paralyzed. Productive activities and profitable commerce are well-nigh impossible. The greatest duty of statesmen is to promote the profitable employment of the people, to furnish them facilities in sound currency and credits, to remove obstructions to commerce and production, make raw materials accessible, promote transportation.

European business men would rejoice to have the use of this gold currency.

It would tend to immediately stabilize contracts and credits, stimulate production and employment.

It would tend to stabilize exchange.

It would greatly assist Germany to meet its reparation bills in gold payments, and thus help France, Belgium, Great Britain, and Italy.

It would help to make the gold dollar the standard measure of international contracts.

It would make the United States the greatest and most useful servant of mankind, and entitle America to the increased respect of the whole world.

It will enable Europe to create the commodities needed to pay America $1,500,000,000 of debts and interest thereon.

It will preserve the gold standard and prevent Europe going permanently to a paper-money basis.

It will increase the demand for gold for monetary use in Europe, where such demand has largely ceased to the disadvantage of our excess hoarded gold and its purchasing power.

It will be profitable and earn a minimum of $75,000,000 per annum.

It will stimulate our foreign commerce or exports and imports.

It will tend to raise the prices of our export products, to increase the employment and the wages of labor in the United States, and relieve our present industrial depression.

Foreign nations alone can place their currencies on a gold par basis. If they conclude to do that, they must balance their budgets, be economical, by taxes take up their surplus currency, and arrange a plan by which debtors will pay their debts or bonds on the gold basis of value, so that the debtor, whether a citizen or a nation, shall only pay the gold value originally advanced by the creditor. On this basis Governments would only tax their people to the extent of what the Government got in terms of gold when they sold their bonds. There must be some equitable adjustment between the debtors and creditors in Europe, between the bondholders and the taxpayers of Europe. It can be done, but it is a matter exclusively in the hands of the statesmen of the several countries involved.

We can nevertheless furnish them with a gold-secured currency and with credits, and this assistance to Europe I urge upon you.

We should agree to merge the interest on the European national debts to our Government into the principal of the debt for the next 5 or 10 years.

We should put the interest at the prewar rate, 3 per cent.

We should extend the time for paying the principal for from 30 to 50 years.

We should help them with our gold and give them a gold-commodity secured currency and the credits that would be easily afforded through the proposed Federal reserve foreign bank.

When we extend the payment of the European War debts to 30 or 50 years now we should do the same thing in the United States and extend the payment of the United States war bonds for a like period.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD a letter from John F. Shafroth to accompany my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Denver Post of Jan. 15, 1922.]

SHAFROTH SUGGESTS PLAN TO SOLVE INTERNATIONAL PROBLEMS OF PAPER MONEY—FORMER COLORADO SENATOR URGES HARDING TO SEND REPRESENTATIVES OF UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT TO INTERNATIONAL ECONOMIC CONFERENCE IN GENOA.

A plan to get rid of the irredeemable paper currencies in foreign nations, which he blames largely for the present high cost of living, is suggested by former United States Senator John F. Shafroth, of Denver, in a letter sent Saturday to President Harding.

Mr. Shafroth recently spent several months in Europe, making an exhaustive study of financial conditions there. In placing the result of his observations before the President, he expresses the hope that the United States will send its Secretary of State, Secretary of the Treasury, and Comptroller of the Currency to the international economic conference called to meet in Genoa. His letter to the President follows:

DENVER, COLO., January 14, 1922.

President WARREN G. HARDING,
White House, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I have recently returned from a six-months' trip to Europe. I noticed in the press a few days ago that the supreme council of the allied nations has called an international economic conference to meet in Genoa, Italy. I hope you will accept the invitation extended to the United States, and that our delegates will consist of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Comptroller of the Currency. They surely can be trusted not to lead us into deep waters.

Allow me to suggest why an international conference upon the subject is of great importance to the people of the United States.

First. Many nations of Europe have issued so much irredeemable paper currency that it is very difficult for our merchants or manufacturers to have commercial transactions with their business men.

MANY NATIONS ISSUE CURRENCY.

Irredeemable paper currencies have been issued by the following nations, for the following amounts, measured in American dollars at normal rates:

France	$7, 160, 000, 000
Italy	4, 110, 000, 000
Austria	19, 100, 000, 000
Hungary	4, 500, 000, 000
Belgium	$1, 180, 000, 000
Czechoslovakia	2, 260, 000, 000
Germany	24, 300, 000, 000
Poland	36, 414, 000, 000
Rumania	2, 384, 000, 000

Bolshevik government of Russia, 5,750,000,000,000 rubles.

Other nations have issued irredeemable paper money for less amounts.

The exchange rates of these currencies with the United States dollar, and with the currencies of each other, are constantly changing, which makes it hazardous to enter into contracts for the purchase or sale of goods and products, even when payment is to be made therefor within 30 or 60 days. I was in Vienna for two weeks and a half and during that time the Austrian crown fell 50 per cent in exchange for American dollars. For the foreign merchant to contract for American goods in American dollars is hazardous to him, because he does not know how much of the irredeemable currency he will have to give in order to obtain the dollars with which to pay for the goods when they arrive. It, therefore, becomes perilous both to American and foreign merchants to contract with each other, especially as to goods to be manufactured and delivered in the future. Hazardous undertakings discourage trade, or at least require large profits, which ultimately must come out of the consumer. Consequently, it is of great moment to Americans to have stability in the value of foreign moneys. Without it our foreign trade will be greatly impaired.

Second, while our foreign trade under present conditions is hampered, yet the losses arising therefrom are insignificant compared to other losses that result from such irredeemable currencies.

Why is the American citizen personally interested in the kind of a currency a European nation may have? It is because these irredeemable paper currencies affect the price of everything he buys whether American or foreign made. How?

According to the Gresham law, two legal tender moneys of different value can not circulate in the same country. The cheaper will always drive out the dearer money. If a man has the option of paying his debts in legal tender money of less value, he will always avail himself of that privilege, and hence the cheaper money becomes the sole circulating medium of that country. In accordance with that principle, gold either in the form of coins or of paper money redeemable in gold, has gone out of circulation in nearly all the nations of Europe. This has decreased the demand for gold, decreased its purchasing power throughout the world, and, consequently, increased the price of everything that gold buys.

GOLD STANDARD USED BEFORE WAR.

In 1914 nearly all the European countries were upon the gold standard, each making demands upon gold for a circulating medium and for monetary redemption purposes. They did fully one-half of the commercial business of the world. The principal use of gold is for monetary purposes—the use for the arts and payment of international balances being comparatively small. By these foreign nations issuing legal tender irredeemable paper currencies, the demand for gold has been greatly diminished. It is this condition more than any other which has produced the high cost of living in the United States.

It is a fundamental principle of political economy that the price of commodities—the demand remaining the same—varies in the inverse ratio of their production; that is, if the production is great the price is proportionately low, and if the production is small the price is correspondingly high.

The price of commodities also varies with the demand therefor, other things remaining the same; the price increasing if the demand is great and decreasing if the demand is small. All recognize these principles when applied to a single commodity. They are also applicable to gold, but as gold is the standard by which all commodities are measured, its increase or decrease in value can not be expressed in its own units, but only in the increased or decreased quantity of things the units will buy, which is manifested in a general rise or fall in prices. Therefore, when all prices rise, it means that there is an increase in the supply of or decrease in the demand for that which measures the price of all things. During the past eight years the annual production of gold has decreased, hence the increased price of things gold will buy is due to the decreased demand for gold caused by European nations substituting irredeemable paper money for their gold currencies or currencies redeemable in gold. By reason thereof gold has become cheap; it buys less, and hence prices are higher. The principle of demand and supply is always operating on each commodity and also on the standard which measures all commodities, and hence prices are affected by each at the same time.

While profiteering affects to some extent the price of some commodities, and prosecutions may curtail the practice, and such prosecutions should be pursued with vigor, yet the result will be small compared to that which will be obtained by increasing the demand for gold.

DECREASED GOLD DEMAND INCREASES LIVING COST.

As the high cost of living in the United States has been produced to a large extent by the decreased demand of the world for gold, it becomes of the highest importance for us to use our influence to restore that demand for gold which existed in the world at the outbreak of the war in 1914. Without the restoration of such demand, normal times can not come.

How can this be accomplished?

By each of such nations agreeing to enact a law, providing that all taxes can be paid partly in gold and partly in the irredeemable paper currency, making the part payable in gold sufficient only to pay the expenses of a most economical administration, and making the remainder of the taxes payable in the irredeemable paper currency, which when paid into the Treasury can be destroyed. It is estimated there is now in the treasuries and banks of the countries of Europe, which have irredeemable paper currencies, gold of the value of $2,022,000,000, and much more that is in hiding, which latter will be drawn out for monetary uses as soon as such a law is enacted, and some demand for gold will immediately arise.

It is also necessary that each of such nations shall enact a law providing that a debtor can discharge his obligation by paying the gold value of his debt at the time it was contracted. Otherwise, he would be compelled to pay many times that which he received. For instance, the Italian citizen who borrowed 100,000 lire when the lira was worth only one-fourth of its normal value, would, when it is brought to its normal value, be compelled to pay that amount in gold; that is, four times the value of that which he borrowed, which would be unconscionable. This law would produce equity between the debtor and creditor. The gold value of what the debtor borrowed was what he received at the time the obligation was incurred, and that is what the creditor parted with in making the loan.

The gold value of the irredeemable currencies at all times can be ascertained from the money quotations of the principal bourse or treasury department of each nation.

Our Government has the confidence and respect of all the nations and our reasonable suggestions would be welcomed.

If some plan to get rid of these irredeemable paper currencies is not worked out, bankruptcy and ruin of such nations are likely to follow, with the accompaniments, repudiation and anarchy, and at least much of the high cost of living will continue in the United States many years.

Yours, truly, JOHN F. SHAFROTH.

PROSPECT HILL CEMETERY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BALL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House bill 7601, to amend an act incorporating Prospect Hill Cemetery, and for other purposes.

Mr. CURTIS. Let the bill be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STANFIELD in the chair). The Secretary will read the bill.

The reading clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That wherever the words "members of the German Evangelical Society" occur in the original act of incorporation entitled "An act to incorporate the proprietors of Prospect Hill Cemetery," approved June 13, 1860 (12 Stat., 32), they shall be interpreted and construed to mean and shall signify the proprietors of lots in said cemetery.

That the affairs, business, and property of said corporation shall be under the direction, control, and management of a board of seven trustees, any five of whom shall constitute a quorum with full authority to act, which board of trustees shall be elected annually by the proprietors of lots in said cemetery, and the trustees shall elect and appoint from their own board a president, a secretary, and a treasurer; also appoint all necessary officers and agents and fix their duties and compensation, and make such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they may deem proper for conducting the affairs of the corporation for the government of lot holders and visitors to the cemetery. The board of trustees shall have authority to fill temporary vacancies occurring in their board and shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified.

SEC. 2. That the annual meeting of the proprietors of lots shall be held in the District of Columbia the second Tuesday of March of each and every year, the place and hour of assembling to be specified in a public notice previously given by the board of trustees, and at such meeting there shall be at least 15 lot proprietors in order to constitute a quorum to transact business. In the election of the trustees at such meeting each lot proprietor shall be entitled to one vote. Said corporation is authorized and empowered to sell any part of said cemetery grounds not used for burial purposes, and particularly that land situate west of North Capitol Street, and invest the proceeds thereof for the care, maintenance, and improvement of said cemetery, and without the purchaser being required to see to the application of the purchase money.

SEC. 3. That the said act of Congress approved June 13, 1860 (12 Stat., 32) and the subsequent acts of Congress approved August 5, 1890 (26 Stat., 299), and February 28, 1907 (34 Stat., 1008–1009), so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby amended so as to authorize and empower the sale of the land hereinbefore provided.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if that is one of the abandoned cemeteries in the city here?

Mr. BALL. No. This part of the land never has been used as a cemetery. The land was bought in 1858, and the society was incorporated in 1860. Later North Capitol Street cut off a part of the land, leaving a part to the west of the street.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator whether the part that is covered by this bill is now subject to taxation?

Mr. BALL. No; it is not.

Mr. CURTIS. Would this bill make it subject to taxation?

Mr. BALL. This bill would make the part to which the bill refers subject to taxation, yielding about $4,000 a year.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to its consideration.

Mr. BALL. Further than that, Mr. President, I am informed that at least 100 houses will be built on this tract between now and next summer if it is released. The owners have no right now to sell it for anything but burial purposes, and they have no right to bury anybody in it, owing to certain laws passed since North Capitol Street was extended, so it is necessarily idle, with no taxation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BALL. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD in this connection the letter which I send to the desk.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 22, 1921.

HON. LEWIS HEISLER BALL,
United States Senate.

DEAR SIR: I take the privilege of addressing you to give you some data in reference to H. R. 7601 for the relief of the Prospect Hill Cemetery Association.

About 25 years ago, when North Capitol Street was opened through the grounds of this cemetery, a parcel of land fell off west of this street. This ground, which is now outside of the cemetery proper and has never been and never can be used for burial purposes, we desire to sell in order to get some revenue out of it. The proceeds from the sale are to be used solely for the improvement and maintenance of the cemetery (and no other uses).

As our charter now stands, it allows us to sell for burial purposes only. This abandoned ground has been lying waste for the past 25 years, not bringing the cemetery association or the District one cent of revenue, whereas if improved it would probably produce yearly from three to four thousand dollars to the District in taxes.

Originally the ground for this cemetery was purchased in 1858 by a society known as the German Evangelical Society. This society, fostering benevolent and religious tendencies, disbanded about 30 years ago, and the sole ownership and control of the cemetery was by decree of the court put in the hands of the lot holders. We therefore desire to have the words "German Evangelical Society" eliminated from our original charter.

This cemetery is nonsectarian, is a fraternal affair in which every lot holder has equal rights in its property and control, and I may add is the resting place of over 100 veterans of the Civil War.

Thanking you for the interest you take in this matter, I remain,

Very respectfully,

WM. STIEBELING,
President Prospect Hill Cemetery.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I sympathize with the purpose that this bill aims to carry out. I believe that passenger as well as freight rates are too high; but I agree with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] that Congress should exercise its power by delegating the authority to issue mileage books to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I think the proposition of the Senator from Iowa is incontrovertible, that if Congress should enact this measure without the amendment proposed by him the result would be that the Interstate Commerce Commission would have to take into account the reduction in revenues that such a change in the passenger rates would bring about before it could pass upon the question of a reduction in freight rates. The result then would be a delay in the determination of the matter of freight-rate reduction, which, in my judgment, is a far more important matter.

Indeed, Mr. President, I believe that an early and sweeping reduction in freight rates, not alone on farm products but on lumber and other building materials, coal, and a great number of manufactured products, is imperative if we are to have a revival of business activity in this country. Unquestionably greater economic benefit to this country just at this time lies in lower freight charges rather than lower passenger rates. The present exorbitant freight rates are a bar to the restoration of prosperity. I believe the passage of this bill without the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa would delay the Interstate Commerce Commission in passing upon pending applications for a reduction in freight rates. Let us direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to require the railroads to issue mileage books at a fair reduction below the fare for single-trip tickets, so that the commission can pass upon this matter just as soon as it has determined the more important question of a reduction of freight rates. By adopting this course we shall hasten rather than delay action on the proposed freight-rate reduction, and at the same time we will give the Interstate Commerce Commission the needed authority to deal with the mileage-book question.

Let me repeat, Mr. President, that the country's most urgent domestic issue at this moment is relief from high rail rates on lumber, building material, coal, grain, live stock, and many other commodities. Manufacturing, commercial, and agricultural organizations all over the country have forwarded to Congress within the last few weeks urgent appeals for relief. For a year or more high rail rates have stood most in the way of national recovery. Now they are more than blocking the way to recovery—they are destroying the very factors that create business and that produce national prosperity—and this situation is growing worse instead of better. Derangement of the fuel situation now constitutes a menace to the entire country. Consumers are waiting expectantly for lower freight rates. We are informed in the newspapers to-day by the National Coal Association that freight charges on coal have increased as much as 200 per cent since 1914, and that the present average cost of transporting a ton of coal from the mines to the consumer is $2.74, while the price of the product itself at the mine is $2.14. The 1921 building season passed with no resumption of sorely needed home building, freight charges having absorbed price reductions.

Last summer and fall many farm, orchard, and garden products rotted or wasted where they grew, because it did not pay to ship them. This destruction and waste will be enormously augmented if in the coming season there is no mitigation of these adverse rail conditions. Between low prices—the lowest in 10 years, says the Department of Agriculture—high rail rates and little credit, the Nation's live-stock industry already has received such a blow that it will take years to restore this wrecked provider of our meat. In all of the producing States it is common knowledge that the farmers lost money on every bushel of wheat they harvested last year, as well as on their hay and on nearly every other crop; and one of the chief reasons was that they were compelled to pay high shipping charges. That the burden of the conduct of the railroads should fall so heavily and unequally on the farmer is not just.

It is true that reductions have been made on wheat, corn, oats, and certain classes of live stock; but agricultural freights generally are still at least 50 per cent above the prewar basis, whereas practically all farm products are selling below the prewar basis.

I learn from the International Harvester Co. that their freight bill on the material that goes into a binder amounts to $35, for a power hay press $95, for a thrashing machine $200, and before the finished article reaches the farmer's field the freight from factory to him must be added. The total would be unbelievable if we did not know the facts. When we consider that it takes about 6 tons of raw material to make 1 ton of finished steel, and about 3 tons of raw steel to make 1 ton of farm machinery, we can see that on the item of steel alone the freight charges must amount to a big item.

I could go on indefinitely and in detail presenting alarming instances in confirmation of the damage being wrought throughout the country, and its increasingly serious effect on all interests; but the facts are known to everyone. The simple explanation for the presence of this emergency is that the present high rates were fixed when war-time prices were at their peak, when nearly all prices and values were swollen. Commodity prices have long ago come down, and are steadily declining. We must admit that the railroads are not making their usual dividends; but can we say they ever will be able to better their condition by insisting on rates that in many instances virtually are prohibitive? And will the people much longer overlook the fact that at a time when every other business had to reduce its charges these high rates, amounting to a tax upon the country of one and one-half billions annually, were put into effect and have remained in effect for a year and a half, with reductions in comparatively few cases?

Mr. President, the railroads are entitled to a fair return on their investment. Doubless further reductions in the cost of operation must be brought about if we are to have lower rates and at the same time fair returns to the carriers; but the high rail rates have got to come down. The country knows it, and so do the railway heads. Circumstances finally will compel it. The sooner they come down the better for the country and for the roads.

LOANS TO FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, in December I asked consideration of Senate resolution 195, and on the request of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] and also on the request of the chairman of the Finance Committee I let it go over. I ask that it be considered now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that there be taken from the table Senate resolution 195, which the Secretary will read for the information of the Senate.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the payment of the financial obligations owing by foreign Governments to the United States as a result of the war with Germany directly involves matters of utmost national and international importance; and

Whereas Governments and individuals will be materially assisted in the ultimate solution of the many problems confronting them growing out of and related to the payment of such obligations by an expression of the policy of the Senate of the United States of America in relation to such payments: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is hereby declared to be the sense of the Senate that the Government of the United States will be unable to agree to or accept the cancellation or discharge of such obligations, or any part of them, without payment.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, personally I do not intend to object to the consideration of the resolution, as I understand it has been submitted to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, and he has no objection to it; but I should not object to it for the reason that in House bill 8762, which has been reported by the Finance Committee, I find the following provision, which is virtually the resolving part of the resolution:

That this act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of the bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government, or cancellation of any part of such indebtedness except through payment thereof.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I think the resolution ought to be submitted to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee under the circumstances, and I would like to have it lie over until to-morrow, so that the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee may see it. I do not know that I shall have any objection to the resolution, but I do think he ought to be consulted about it, as it expresses a national policy. He is now engaged in a great conference, and I really think it ought to be brought to his attention.

Mr. CURTIS. If the Senator from Georgia will withhold the resolution until to-morrow, I will try to see the senior Senator from Massachusetts before the Senate meets to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. I will be very glad to do that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, while I think I am heartily in favor of the resolution, it does seem to me that on a matter of such importance, meaning so much to the countries of the world, we ought to treat it in a little more dignified way, and the resolution ought to be referred to one of the committees of the Senate and reported by it to the Senate, and then acted upon.

As I said, I am heartily in favor of it, as I heard it read; yet we do owe something to the other countries, and I think that a matter of such tremendous importance ought to be treated in a very dignified way.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not see in this matter anything which would require consideration by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a mere restatement, so to speak, of a provision in the funding bill, which has heretofore been reported to the Senate. It may be said to be a declaration of policy, but, at the same time, it is a declaration about a policy with regard to which I do not understand there is the slightest division in this Chamber, and there ought not to be in the country.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, in view of the fact that we have a bill pending which deals with the subject of the foreign debts and authorizes refunding, what is the necessity of our making any declaration at all? During the consideration of that bill there is bound to be discussion, and by the passage of that bill, if it shall pass—and I have no doubt that it will pass, with or without amendment—we will put ourselves on record as to the policy which should be pursued relative to the funding of our foreign indebtedness.

Speaking for myself upon a question of this character, when there is a bill pending and which will be passed within a day or two, making a broad and general declaration, I do not think that we should pass a resolution of this kind.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not desire to discuss the policy of the matter. I simply rose for the purpose of saying that, so far as I was concerned as a member of the Finance Committee, which reported a bill making a similar declaration, I have no objection to the resolution. I understood from a conversation I had with the chairman of the Finance Committee that he has no objection to it. I do not see that it is necessary to pass it; I do not know that it is; but I do not think it is objectionable. On the contrary, I think the sooner we let the Governments which are indebted to us understand that their debts are not to be forgiven, or to be reduced, the better.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the resolution seeks to declare the policy of the Government with respect to credits belonging to the Government aggregating $10,000,000,000. We have a rule of the Senate which requires such matters to go to one of the regular committees for hearing and report. I am one of those who believe that this debt should not be forgiven, but I am very clearly of the opinion that we ought not to adopt any such resolution as this without having the benefit of suggestions from a proper committee and without full and free discussion on the floor of the Senate, and for this reason I shall object to its further consideration at this time. I think it ought to be referred to a committee.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I was just about to rise to ask permission to withdraw the resolution; but I want to say that out of courtesy to the other side of the Chamber, who are in charge of the Government at this time, and at the request of the leaders on the other side I have not pressed this matter. The chairman and some other members of the Finance Committee have discussed it to a certain extent, although the resolution was on the table. I want the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], for whom I have such high regard, to know that I have not tried to hurry the consideration of the resolution, but, on the other hand, out of consideration for the wishes of the leaders on his side of the Chamber this matter has been held up. I thought it had been considered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not intend, of course, to reflect upon the Senator from Georgia. I was engaged in conversation, and I thought the resolution had just been presented to the Senate. I did not know it had been presented before. I know the Senator from Georgia would not desire to do anything improper, and I did not intend to reflect upon him in any way. I merely thought that it was a matter of such great importance that it ought to go to a committee and be reported upon by a committee, either favorably or unfavorably. As I said before, I am in favor, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is, of no part of the debt being remitted.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I wish to make some remarks upon the pending bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I would like to have the Senator recognized, so that he can proceed in the morning, and after having obtained the floor that he yield to me in order that we may have an executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock p. m.), under the unanimous-consent agreement previously entered into, the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, January 21, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 20, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Heavenly Father, Thou dost bind us to Thee with the bands of unfailing love. Truly Thou art the pledge of all our joys and the surety of all our hopes. Renew the strength of our wills and blend them all with Thine. In rest and in labor consider us, dear Lord. Reclaim us from any ways of error that the purpose of Thy righteous laws may be fulfilled. In full accord with Thy plans may we always be. For Thy name's sake and for the welfare of our country enable us to spend our days patiently, faithfully, and unselfishly. O extend Thy protecting arm toward us and make our paths secure. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MERRITT, by unanimous consent, was granted leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of George Rutherford, H. R. 15677, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Also, to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Charles A. Frid, H. R. 15702, Sixty-sixth Congress, third session, no adverse report having been made thereon.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE—ST. LAWRENCE PROJECT.

The SPEAKER. A few days ago, when the President transmitted the report of the International Joint Commission relative to the improvement of the St. Lawrence River and navigation from the Great Lakes to the sea, the Chair asked leave to withhold reference because he had been notified by some Members of the House that they desired to be heard upon it.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors each claimed that the report, and any bills that follow it, should be referred to their respective committee. The Chair had an informal hearing, in which members of each committee appeared, and very ably, and greatly to the assistance of the Chair, argued the question, and also filed briefs giving the precedents. The Chair has given consideration to it, and admits that the question is delicate and not easy to decide, because there are precedents for each of the committees.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs argues, and justly, that it involves a treaty, involves an international commission, and that those questions belong to that committee. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce argues, and justly, that it involves a canal, involves the creation and transmission of power, which subjects belong to them. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors argues, and justly, that it involves an improvement of the navigation of the St. Lawrence River and of the harbors upon the Lakes, and in consequence belongs to their committee. And each committee has abundant authority and precedent for its claim. Inasmuch as each committee can show precedents and reasons which, if they stood alone, would compel the reference of the subject to that committee, the Chair has endeavored to determine what was the main, underlying, dominant motive and feature of the project and be governed by that in the reference.

The Chair has concluded, after careful consideration, that the weight of argument and of precedents is in favor of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, because, it seems to the Chair, a main and dominant feature of the subject is the great Welland Canal, and that of itself would come under the jurisdiction of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. To be sure, it is in Canadian territory, and will be built by the Canadians, but proportional compensation for it must be arranged, directly or indirectly, by the United States. The creation and transmission of power is also one of the great, dominant features, and that, too, belongs to the same committee. It seems to the Chair that those two features are so important and predominant as to give the strongest claim to that committee. While, of course, the whole purpose of the project is commerce, the House can at any time determine by vote what committee it shall go to. The Chair has taken this unusual action of stating, briefly, the ground of his reference, because of the unusual interest and the elaborate argument that was made by the different committees. The Chair refers it to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Mr. Speaker, when would be a proper time to move for reference?

The SPEAKER. Any morning after the reading of the Journal. The Chair thinks it ought to be done with the mutual knowledge of the committees, of course.

Mr. DEMPSEY. Might we not set it down for to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be perfectly willing to have it to-morrow morning, or any morning on which the representatives of the different committees might agree.

Mr. DEMPSEY. In view of the fact that there is a decision, does the Speaker think there might be debate on the question of reference? I know that under the rule it is not debatable, and it is also very rarely that a decision is announced. In fact, I know of no precedent for the announcement of a decision, but in view of there having been a decision announced adverse to the committee which I have the honor to represent and adverse to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I think it might be for the benefit of the House to have a debate on the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would be very appropriate that the House should grant unanimous consent for an argument.

Mr. WALSH. And the gentleman's motion can only be made by direction of the committee seeking the change of reference.

Mr. DEMPSEY. That can be procured in the meantime, I have no doubt, and will conform to that rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I have not the rule before me, but my recollection is that the rule applies only to bills. Of course, this is a message. Whether by reasoning the same rule would apply to a message, I am not prepared to say.

The SPEAKER. The rule says all bills, resolutions, and documents come under the rule.

Mr. DEMPSEY. What is the question?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was merely suggesting that my recollection was that the rule only mentioned bills that might be referred by motion, but the Speaker has just read the rule and says it refers to bills, resolutions, and documents. I was raising the question whether it would apply to a message.

Mr. DEMPSEY. There is both a bill and a report here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would refer any bill or resolution on the same subject to the same committee, subject to whatever the House might decide.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What became of the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DEMPSEY] for a hearing to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman made a motion. The Chair thinks it should be made with the knowledge of the different committees.

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce is not here, and as no rights will be lost, I suggest the matter be held over to next week, until the matter can be considered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2994. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge over and across the headwaters of Mobile Bay and such navigable channels as are between the east side of the bay and Blakely Island, in Baldwin and Mobile Counties, Ala.," approved October 5, 1917.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. SWANSON members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the Bureau of Navigation and Engineering.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2994. An act to revive and reenact the act entitled "An act to authorize the Gulf Ports Terminal Railway Co., a corporation existing under the laws of the State of Florida, to construct a bridge over and across the headwaters of Mobile Bay and such navigable channels as are between the east side of the bay and Blakely Island, in Baldwin and Mobile Counties, Ala.," approved October 5, 1917; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, before going into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, I would like to see, if possible, if we can agree upon a time for general debate on the pending measure.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana consumed about four hours yesterday. I consumed of the time allotted to me about half an hour. How much time does the gentleman want on his side?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Counting the time that we occupied yesterday, I think if we had an hour we could get through all right.

Mr. HARRISON. An additional hour?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If we could agree to four hours and a half on a side, and include the time already occupied, it would be all right.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. How much time was consumed yesterday on each side?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We consumed 3 hours and 44 minutes on our side and you consumed 28 minutes on your side.

Mr. HARRISON. Four hours more would suit me.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the general debate on the independent offices bill be limited to nine hours, half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia and the other half to be controlled by myself, and that in the computation of that time the time that was consumed in general debate yesterday be counted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that general debate on the appropriation bill for independent offices be limited to nine hours in all, including the time already occupied, and half of the whole time to be consumed by himself and half by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON]. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Let me ask the gentleman a question. You do not anticipate that you can get through with this bill this week?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am in hopes that we shall get through to-morrow. We will if we can.

The SPEAKER. The Chair put the question, understanding that the 9 hours included the 4½ hours already consumed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the antilynching bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the antilynching bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981, known as the independent offices bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers on that vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Speaker appointed Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee and Mr. WOOD of Indiana to act as tellers.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981, the independent offices appropriation bill, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is recognized.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], the chairman of the subcommittee, has made such a thorough study of the appropriations carried in this bill and has made such a full and complete statement of the character and the nature of the bill that little need be added by way of explanation.

A number of governmental activities are taken care of. Nineteen in all. First, the Executive; second, the Alien Property Custodian; third, the Bureau of Efficiency; fourth, the Civil Service Commission; fifth, the Commission of Fine Arts, about which we heard something yesterday; sixth, the Employees' Compensation Commission; seventh, the Federal Power Commission; eighth, the Federal Trade Commission; ninth, the General Accounting Office; tenth, the United States Housing Corporation; eleventh, the Interstate Commerce Commission; twelfth, the National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics; thirteenth, the Railroad Labor Board; fourteenth, the Smithsonian Institution; fifteenth, the State, War, and Navy Departments buildings; sixteenth, the Tariff Commission; seventeenth, the United States Geographic Board; eighteenth, the United States Shipping Board; and nineteenth, the United States Veterans' Bureau.

Some of these governmental activities carry merely the ordinary appropriation and need but little notice. Thus in the first, the Executive, which provides for the payment of the salaries of the President and his official household and of the Vice President and for the care of the Executive Mansion and grounds, a small increase of $15,000 over last year seems within reason. The seventh, the Federal Power Commission, carries a permanent appropriation. My time is too limited to notice the General Accounting Office, National Advisory Committee for Aeronautics, the Smithsonian Institution, State, War, and Navy buildings, Tariff Commission, United States Geographic Board, or the Commission of Fine Arts. Much matter of interest is connected with all of them.

The second activity—the Alien Property Custodian—is one of the very important Government activities. It has charge of most important property rights. Millions of dollars of property seized during the war are still held by the Government awaiting proper legislation for restoration to their owners. The Government, as trustee, is engaged in the prosecution of many varied enterprises. This ought not to be continued an hour longer than necessary. The prolongation of the seizure beyond necessity is robbery. I understand legislation is necessary, and the Appropriations Committee is without jurisdiction. Most of the expense is paid out of the trust funds, but these heavy expenses and losses are inflicted oftentimes on innocent people.

The eighth, the Federal Trade Commission, and tenth, the United States Housing Corporation, are governmental agencies of great importance to the people of this country. The Interstate Commerce Commission had its duties largely increased by reason of the Esch-Cummins bill.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. In reading the hearings I see that it is contemplated that the valuation work that has been in progress for several years on the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission will probably be completed at the end of 1924. It occurs to me that it is a very desirable thing to have this valuation completed at the very earliest possible date, and I was wondering if the gentleman's committee had gone into that question of whether or not it would be possible, for example, by increasing the appropriation for 1923, to have this valuation work wound up during the year 1923?

Mr. HARRISON. Our understanding was that they required that time on account of the magnitude of the work.

Mr. BLACK. It may be that the work is so organized that it would not be possible. I did not know whether the committee had gone into that feature or not.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know that any special inquiry was made along that line, but the Interstate Commerce Commission gave us the information that they were doing the work as rapidly as practicable.

Mr. BLACK. I notice that the hearings state that it would probably be completed in the year 1924, but it was not made clear in those hearings as to whether it could be expedited or not. I wanted to get some information on that.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know as to that particular fact.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Before the gentleman passes on to another subject, may I ask the gentleman what the hearings show with reference to the progress that has been made in the valuation work? It is said that not a single road has so far been finally valued; that there have been only tentative valuations; and that those tentative valuations apply to only about 100 roads. Now, that being the rate of speed, it seems to me we may assume the completion of the work may run beyond 1924. The question is whether the results will be of any great value that are presented to the Congress or the country at that time.

Mr. HARRISON. I could not speak specifically on that question. In several States the State authorities, I believe, regard with some suspicion this national valuation as hostile to State valuations for taxation purposes, but I do not recall the hearings sufficiently at the present time to speak definitely in regard to the inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia.

The Civil Service Commission asked for increased salaries and increased appropriations, and it seems to me that they have made out a very good case; but a very novel situation exists in regard to the Civil Service Commission that I do not think ought to be permitted. They draw 200 of their employees from the other departments. When we make up the appropriations for the Civil Service Commission we inquire into the necessity for the amounts to be appropriated for their official force, and for some unexplained reason—I do not know why—the appropriations are always less by 200 employees than the number required by the Civil Service Commission. The result is that they draw employees from the other departments of the Government who are paid for out of the appropriations made for the other departments.

In other words, when the committee examine into the necessities of the War Department or the Treasury Department they make appropriations for the force supposed to be necessary for that department, and when the committee come to inquire into the necessities of the Civil Service Commission they inquire what appropriations should be made for the employees of that branch of the Government service, but for some reason or other they make this extra appropriation to these other departments so as to enable them to detail to the Civil Service Commission some 200 of their employees. The Alien Property Custodian has under his jurisdiction 11 employees paid out of the appropriation that is made for his bureau, and the only service they render is in connection with the Civil Service Commission. They are paid out of the funds appropriated for the Alien Property Custodian. He has control of them, and for some unexplained reason they are detailed to the Civil Service Commission. It does seem to me that this is an entirely wrong principle on which to proceed. The Civil Service Commission have no proper control of these detailed employees. The subcommittees investigating into the necessities of the various departments of the Government have no information upon which to make the appropriations, because these employees are used for entirely different purposes than the ones appropriated for.

I may say that the Labor Board, which fixes the compensation of railroad employees, is a Government activity of great importance. After the war had been concluded this Labor Board increased the wages paid to railroad employees in this country by $600,000,000 over the wage schedules of the war period. I understand they have now reduced that amount by $400,000,000, so that the wages paid to railroad employees are now $200,000,000 in excess of the wages that were paid during the war.

There are in this bill two very important activities that in my judgment overshadow all others. One of these is the Veterans' Bureau and the other is the Shipping Board.

Yesterday the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] spent a great deal of time discussing the Shipping Board, and I understood him to say that he considered that to be one of the greatest business organizations in this country. I do not know how great a business organization it is, but it is one of the greatest burdens this Government has ever had imposed upon it. Functionary after functionary of the present Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation appeared as witnesses at the hearings. The burden of their testimony was criticisms of the work of the old board and extravagant laudations of the new.

If the functionaries of the old board should be called we would probably have the picture reversed, and in the end be as wise as we are now. We have heard the functionaries of the new Shipping Board and their commendation of themselves, and their criticism of the old board are about all the information we have concerning the activities of the Shipping Board.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I have read the hearings, and I find that Mr. Lasker appeared before your subcommittee and asked for $50,000,000, and further on in his statement he said he did not know whether they would need $50,000,000 or not, but that was his guess. I wish to ask the gentleman, why did the subcommittee report an appropriation of $50,000,000?

Mr. HARRISON. He said he needed that sum in order that he might have the necessary financial backing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Further on he stated that he did not know that he would need it.

Mr. HARRISON. I think his idea is that he proposes to use this $50,000,000 in the operating expenses. Of course, if he makes more money in the operation of the ships than he now expects to make, he will not need all the $50,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. May I suggest that further on he states that they are losing $4,000,000 a month?

Mr. HARRISON. Four and a half million a month, I understand.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I should like to ask the gentleman how he is going to make anything if he is going in the hole four and a half million dollars a month?

Mr. HARRISON. As I say, this Shipping Board presents the greatest case of a white elephant that this Government, or any other, has ever undertaken to deal with. When the members of the Shipping Board were before the Committee on Appropriations last August there was one thing on which they dwelt with more particularity than anything else in criticism of the old Shipping Board, and that was the contracts known as the M. O. 4 contracts. I believe every man who has given consideration to these contracts denounces them as entirely vicious. They are based on the same principle that was used in what were known as the cost-plus contracts in construction work. The agents who are paid to operate these ships receive 5 per cent commission on receipts out and 2½ per cent of the receipts coming in, so that it is to the interest of these operating agents to secure the largest amounts of receipts that they can without regard to the burdens they impose. These contracts were denounced by the present Shipping Board as late as last August, and it was the information of the members of the Appropriations Committee that this board intended to end those contracts. Instead of doing so we find that nearly every ship is now being operated by the Shipping Board under one of these M. O. 4 contracts. There are 400 ships now being operated by the Shipping Board under these contracts, and they are being operated at a heavy loss. I understand that the Shipping Board say that they have taken precautions to see that there shall be no abuses of these contracts, but that is not the point.

The principle is that the men who manage these ships receive their pay in proportion to the amount of receipts, without regard to the expenses incurred in securing those receipts. An instance was given where one of these ships was turned back to get some more freight after it had gone to sea, and the expense of turning back was far greater than the remuneration received from the freight; but it is to the interest of these agents to increase the receipts without regard to the expenses borne by the ships, which are borne in fact by the Government. These contracts have been denounced on this floor on both sides of the aisle. They have been denounced in the public press. They have been condemned by public opinion as being an utterly improper method of making contracts for Government operation.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. MANN. Do they get a percentage on the expenses or only a percentage on the receipts?

Mr. HARRISON. I think they get it on the receipts—that is my understanding—without regard to expenses. Their idea is to swell the receipts without regard to the expense. I asked that direct question of the Shipping Board people at the hearing, whether the contract was not in principle exactly like the 5 per cent cost-plus contract.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman permit me to read a statement by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] when the bill was up before the House last August?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER (reading):

The ships are operated under what is called an M. O. 4 and an M. O. 3 contract. That means a managing operator's contract. The contract provides that the Government of the United States shall expend all the money to operate the ship, to keep it in repair, to pay its port charges, to pay any damages, to pay the men, and that the operating manager is to receive 5 per cent of the gross receipts. It does not make much difference whether these accounts are ever audited or not, because there can be no possibility of profit to the Government of the United States on that kind of a contract. There has been great loss in the operation of the ships. It is estimated that that loss amounts for last year to $200,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. We find these contracts in operation to-day just as they were, with some modifications, which I do not think are material, when they were subject to criticism.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. There are not as many M. O. 4 contracts to-day as formerly.

Mr. HARRISON. They are all running under M. O. 4 contracts.

Mr. EDMONDS. There are quite a few boat charters.

Mr. HARRISON. If there are any that are not running under those contracts, it is because we do not have as many ships.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. There is this modification that has taken place—the Stevedore's Co. has been abolished; that was a company owned by the operating managers. That work is being done by the Shipping Board, so that there is that saving. Another thing that has been done is that instead of $1.25 a day per man for food they only allow them 80 cents, and there are several other modifications.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; there are several modifications, but the principle is still there, and the principle is vicious.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What would be the result if we abrogated these contracts?

Mr. HARRISON. Why can not they operate them and pay the managers a salary? And I take it that an operating agent would prefer having a fixed salary rather than a commission. When he operates under a commission contract he can be depended upon to bring about conditions that will remunerate him and give secondary consideration only to the losses he imposes on the Government.

There was an audit as of July 1, 1921, and after charging all of the assets of this concern at a fair market value, and after debiting a charge of $42,000,000 for still further depreciation of the value of the assets by a possible forced sale, without giving the Government a single dollar of credit for any ship afloat, and charging against the Government every possible liability, there is a large balance in favor of the Government amounting to some three or four hundred million dollars. And yet, under the operations of these contracts, the board has four and a half million dollars a month loss, which will consume the balance which now stands in favor of the Government.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Has the gentleman investigated the receipts and expenditures of the Panama Ship Co., which does not operate under an M. O. contract but employs a captain on each ship and runs the line itself? Has the gentleman investigated the results of that operation?

Mr. HARRISON. No; there are concerns operated by private individuals that have operated at a profit, but it has been stated before the subcommittee that the operations by the Government of these 400 ships as they are now operated will necessarily be at a loss.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. The gentleman understands that the Panama Steamship Co. is a Government-owned line.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. There will be a loss of $50,000,000 a year, but the operations only create a loss of $1,000,000 a month, whereas the other $3,000,000 is to a very large extent for maintaining the ships that are tied up at the docks, and that loss will be incurred whether you have any ships running or not.

Mr. HARRISON. Why should it be? And in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] I want to call the attention of the House to the enormous overhead burden that imposes a loss on the taxpayers even if every boat were tied to the dock. It is impossible in my limited time to expose in every detail the riotous extravagance that produces such a result, but a few illustrations must suffice. The present board proposes to spend $900,000 alone for advertisements. They have an advertising agent receiving under the old board $4,000 salary, and he winds up in the new board at a salary of $9,500. In November last, and since, a successor has been receiving $10,000 a year. This enormous annual outlay of $900,000 is in excess of every advertising scheme of private companies. It is $900,000 a year, simply in advertising the running of these ships which are necessarily being run at a loss by the Government.

But that is not all. I have here the actual list of officials and their salaries, where the salaries are over $3,000, that I think ought to go into the RECORD, and I ask leave to incorporate it as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD the matter indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Here are two men that receive a salary of $35,000 a year. There is not a man in the employ of the Government that receives anything like such a salary. Here is another man that receives $30,000 a year.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Was it brought out in the hearings that this same man who was receiving $35,000 a year has for the last 10 years averaged earning over $100,000 a year?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not care what his average earnings were. The question is whether the Government is going to pay anybody $35,000 a year.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Oh, will the gentleman please respond to my question?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not recall. What I object to is this salary list. I do not think we have to go to these high-priced men, who spend the money of the people in extravagant salaries in that way.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. HARRISON. It is out of all proportion to every salary list ever presented to Congress before. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does the gentleman not think, in view of the experience we have had in the past with the cheaper men, that it is a good deal better to try the experiment of buying the best brains that we can get for the operation of these activities?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what the experience has been, except the testimony of these gentlemen.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Right in that connection, all three of these high-priced experts were connected with the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation under previous administrations, when all of these things occurred that so much criticism is directed against, and all at less salary.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman will find that the employees that I speak of were employees under the old Shipping Board, and are transferred to the new Shipping Board at an increase in the salary list.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. The hearings during the last session of Congress divulged the fact that one lawyer was drawing $9,500 a year on the pay roll of the Shipping Board whose only duties were to lobby before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the House for additional appropriations. I am wondering whether that gentleman is still on the pay roll or not.

Mr. HARRISON. What is his name?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, considering the fact that the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has no jurisdiction over appropriations, does not the gentleman from Kentucky think that is a rather violent statement to make?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am talking about what occurred in the last session of Congress.

Mr. MANN. I know what the case was. The gentleman is in error about the facts.

Mr. EDMONDS. That man is not in the employ of the Shipping Board. The gentleman refers to Mr. Dean, I presume?

Mr. KINCHELOE. I am talking about what developed in the last session of Congress, which showed that one lawyer was on the salary list of the Shipping Board at $9,500 a year, and he admitted in the hearings that about the only thing he did was to consult with the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman is speaking of Mr. Gaines. Mr. Gaines is not employed by the Shipping Board to come up here at the present time and lobby before Congress.

Mr. KINCHELOE. I was wondering whether he was still there. One other question I want to ask, and that is whether one ex-Senator is still on the pay roll of the Shipping Board at a salary of $5,000 a year? I refer to former Senator Sutherland, of Utah. It was disclosed in the discussion at the last session of Congress that his duties were to advise the advisor of the Shipping Board.

Mr. HARRISON. There are plenty of them here at enormous salaries. Here are two others at $25,000. There are two at $35,000 and one at $30,000, and that does not include the seven men who are commissioners of the board, who receive $12,000 a year.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Are these high-priced men connected with the shipping end of the proposition, or are they lawyers?

Mr. HARRISON. These men represent the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Mr. McKENZIE. And have had experience in navigation?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know what they have had experience in.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. These three men the gentleman is speaking of are employed by the Emergency Fleet Corporation. They are operating men; they were not employed by the Shipping Board.

Mr. HARRISON. I could turn to the hearings and show exactly what they do.

Mr. EDMONDS. They were not employed by the Shipping Board when they were employed by this last board; they were in private occupations. These three men have worked to produce results, and in the gentleman's opinion have they produced results?

Mr. HARRISON. I can not say. As I say, we have only the testimony of these gentlemen about what they have done. If we go according to their testimony, they have done a most glorious amount of work.

Mr. EDMONDS. A reduction in the losses on ships from $1,896,000 in July to $654,000 in November is certainly some work.

Mr. HARRISON. It may be.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The very report that the gentleman has shows that in May before they took charge the net operating loss was $1,705,000 and in June it was $6,500,000, and they took charge in June, and then in July it was $6,000,000 and over, and so it runs right along.

Mr. EDMONDS. No, no; the operating loss is $1,896,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I will show the gentleman right there, under the head "operating loss," is $6,000,000, $5,000,000, $6,000,000 and over, and they are asking for $50,000,000 for the year ending in 1923, and right in that connection they have reduced the number of ships in operation from 836 to 390, and have only decreased the expense of operation from approximately $6,000,000 to $4,000,000.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman is only talking about the loss in operation, including the loss of laying up, which you would have anyway. The loss in operation in July was $1,896,000—that is, the excess of expenses over operation costs—and in November $654,000, one-third of what it was in July. Of course there is a less number of ships operating.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Of course it is divided, and in each instance the figures given represent the net operating loss previous to the time they took charge and what it is now; and they have decreased the number of ships in operation more than one-half and have only decreased the cost by 33⅓ per cent.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman's statement, of course, covers the laying up of the ships. I do not think that is fair to consider, because they would have to be paid if you had them all laid up.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think it is anything like as expensive to lay up a ship as it is to operate it when they are all losing money?

Mr. EDMONDS. It so shows.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That is the reason they laid them up—to save money.

Mr. EDMONDS. The overhead is just the same, because you have the ships to take care of.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It ought not to be.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice in the RECORD that Mr. Lasker paid a very high compliment to the employees of the old Shipping Board.

He says:

It is only fair to acknowledge that the completion is due very largely to the enthusiastic cooperation of the old officers and employees of the Fleet Corporation. They deserve high commendation, for they work early and late, Sundays and holidays.

This is somewhat preliminary to what I desire to call attention to. Here we have these high-priced men, seven commissioners at $12,000; we have these six men, two of whom receive $35,000, one $30,000, and two $25,000. Now, it seems to me that if we employ high-class men of that character, we ought to be relieved to some extent of the enormous burden of the money given to the lawyers in this concern. There is paid to the attorneys of this board over $600,000. They get $15,000 a year, seven of them. The others get $10,000, $11,000, and $7,500. Here is a list of the employees, including the attorneys, of 682 people, all over $3,000 a year.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. May I ask the gentleman this question? The summary on the first page of the statement you hold in your hand seems to show there are between 80 and 90 employees of the Shipping Board that receive at least $7,500 a year or more than that. Is not that a fact?

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is there anything parallel to that in our history in connection with the salaries paid by the Government of the United States?

Mr. HARRISON. There is not anything that approaches it. I believe the ordinary run of our citizens in this country, when they read this salary list, will be shocked.

Mr. CONNELL. Will you kindly state how many attorneys are employed by the board and the aggregate of their salaries?

Mr. HARRISON. There are about 78 employed, and the amount paid them is over $600,000.

Mr. CONNELL. Seventy-eight attorneys?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CONNELL. Thank you.

Mr. McKENZIE. Does the gentleman know whether or not in their list of employees they have messengers drawing salaries of $3,000 a year, but covered under a different name? Is that true?

Mr. HARRISON. I would not say as to that.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As the gentleman proceeds, I would like him to clear up my lack of information, by discussing the question as to whether or not the cases handled by the attorneys of the Shipping Board are of such an unusually intricate character as to require the employment of attorneys of highly unusual ability and experience, or whether they are cases that depend on the development of facts and can easily be handled by average lawyers—lawyers like many of us here.

Mr. HARRISON. I have the views of the chairman of our subcommittee here when he was interrogating as to the attorney list in another branch of the service, and I think there is a great deal of force in what he there says:

> Mr. WOOD. You could have gone out here in the country and secured a good lawyer for $3,500, and I suspect he would be as good or a better lawyer than this man is. The man who knows more about the general practice of law is the lawyer in the little county seat and not the man who comes from the big cities, because they specialize and do not know anything about the law except as to their particular specialty. The best practitioners in this country and the most noted lawyers in the world to-day are the country practitioners.

The question is the point of view by which you look at what a man is worth. The head of this establishment is a distinguished lawyer from Chicago, and he has the idea that nobody has any real information unless he hails from Chicago. They are very apt to coincide with him sometimes on this floor. But perhaps that may not be the proper criterion. He is a lawyer that makes a large income from his practice, and he considers that a man who does not make $100,000 a year is perhaps a very inferior lawyer. And that probably explains his idea that he must have this whole legal department permeated by men drawing enormous salaries. This bill increases the right of the board to yet further employ attorneys to the number of seven, and this means seven additional attorneys at salaries of $15,000 to $20,000. They have a claims commission of five men, which they are trying to utilize as a substitute for the Court of Claims, to which they pay over $12,000 each a year. We have a Court of Claims, composed of five eminent lawyers, who receive salaries of about $8,000 each. Why this substitute of five judges with $12,000 each? Such substitute has no function except to endeavor to get claimants to agree to some sort of an adjustment, and they pay them over $12,000 apiece a year.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Do these lawyers to which you refer—I think you said there were 78 of them—devote their time exclusively to the work of the Shipping Board, or do they engage in other practice?

Mr. HARRISON. I am not certain as to that.

Mr. WASON. They devote their entire time to the Shipping Board.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I would like to know what the answer was.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman from New Hampshire said they devoted their entire time to the Shipping Board.

Mr. GALLIVAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire wants to stand on that statement?

Mr. WASON. It is in the record as printed.

Mr. HARRISON. The Shipping Board ignores the Court of Claims with its high-priced substitute, which in fact is no substitute, and ignores with its long string of high-priced attorneys the Department of Justice. The taxpayers will naturally inquire, What do we have a Department of Justice for? Why should we have a Department of Justice, whose business it is to look after the legal interests of this Government? The Attorney General of this Government draws only $12,000 a year. Perhaps that is the reason the Shipping Board thinks he is not qualified to represent the Government.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Is it not a matter of fact that the three wonderfully priced lawyers on this Shipping Board, who, according to the gentleman from New Hampshire, devote all their time and all their brain power to the work of the Shipping Board, have, no one of them, as yet severed their connection with the law firms with which they were formerly affiliated, but they are as yet members of those particular law firms with which they were affiliated before getting these big-priced jobs in the Shipping Board?

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman from New Hampshire can answer that question.

The point I make is that if it should be held in order—and I hope it will be and that this House will adopt it—we should turn over the legal business of this department to that department which has charge of the legal business of the Government. It is the only way, it seems to me, by which we can prevent improper salaries from being paid for legal services. These men have no limitations placed upon them. They can employ whom they please. They can employ at such salaries as they please, with the sole limitation that 13 of them shall not exceed $11,000 each. I do not know what these new attorneys authorized under this bill will draw, but we authorize seven additional ones. We had already authorized six. Now, we authorize seven additional ones, to be employed at the rate of more than $11,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is that in addition to the 78 already employed?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. Seven additional at more than $11,000 each. There is no limitation as to amount. The gentleman at the head of the legal department informs us that he thinks he can get a responsible attorney to represent us in New York at $20,000, but there is no limitation other than that they shall not employ over seven of them in addition to the six now drawing more than $11,000. What I contend for is the fact that the legal business of this Government should be in the hands of the Attorney General.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. It is in the hands of pirates now in that respect.

Mr. HARRISON. The Attorney General is the man to whom the people should look to protect the interests of this Government in all its legal lines.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Can the gentleman inform me what the general counsel gets now, Mr. Schlesinger?

Mr. HARRISON. He gets $10,000 a year.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Schlesinger gets $10,000 a year?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. He employs a whole lot of them, and a lot of them get more salary than he gets himself. I think one said he worked for $24 for a whole year. I understand that is what he charges. But I myself prefer to have men paid their proper compensation. I do not want any $24 men or any $1 men. I want men who are paid a proper compensation to represent this Government, and only a proper compensation, and not these extravagant sums.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Is there any organic law of Congress that creates this legal division of the Shipping Board?

Mr. HARRISON. No. These people are a law to themselves.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Jones Shipping Act allows them to form this legal division.

Mr. HARRISON. I say they are a law unto themselves. The statute that creates them gives them the authority, and it is only limited by the appropriation bill. This is the only place where we can limit it.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Can the gentleman give us an idea of the number of suits pending before the Shipping Board and the amount involved in the litigation?

Mr. HARRISON. It is said that $300,000,000 is involved. But at the same time that they tell us about the $300,000,000, they say if we give them $55,000,000 they will settle the bill.

Mr. DUNBAR. Are the salaries that the Government pays to its attorneys in the gentleman's judgment in excess of the fees paid by those who bring suits against the Government?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes. I say they are enormously in excess, because of those 500 suits that are pending now in the various courts I assume there is not a lawyer concerned in any of them who gets as much as $11,000 a year.

Mr. DUNBAR. Has it not been the gentleman's experience that the fees paid the lawyers are the most excessive of any sums of money received by any class of citizens for services?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know as to that. I never got anything that I thought was excessive, and I am a lawyer. [Laughter.]

Mr. DUNBAR. I want to say to the gentleman that I believe that the high cost of living is largely due to two facts: One the excessive fees received by lawyers everywhere, and the second, by the appreciation in the value of real estate in cities. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. My experience is that the lawyers are the ones that suffer most by the high cost of living.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: Does he not think it reasonable to assume that most of the lawyers employed against the Government take their cases on a contingent basis?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course. I would not be surprised.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. You have not found on investigation that any of the counsel on the other side, representing the Shipping Board, have made contracts of that character?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. They would be glad to.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman has admitted that the lawyers who represent the litigants take the cases on a percentage basis?

Mr. HARRISON. No; I have not admitted it. I have not the faintest idea about it.

Mr. DUNBAR. The gentleman has practically admitted it.

Mr. HARRISON. My colleague [Mr. MOORE] asked me if I thought that was the way, and I said I would not be surprised.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit me, in connection with the inquiry relative to the pay of the attorneys, to read a statement read last year by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] in reference to this subject? It seems that the House gave general approval to the views of Mr. MADDEN announced at that time. Mr. MADDEN, on page 4925 of the RECORD of August 12, 1921, said, referring to the Shipping Board:

> These men came to us and said they had employed high-priced lawyers; that they had turned over cases that were important to distinguished law firms without fixing the limit of cost for the trial of the cases.
> Your committee thought that would be very unwise and uncertain. We wanted to know the cost. We called up the Attorney General and asked what was to be the policy of the Attorney General's office in the matter of the employment of special counsel. He said his office had a regulation under which no man or firm could be employed whose compensation in a given case, no matter how important it is, could exceed the salary of the Attorney General in a given year. [Applause.] And he said, too, that if there was any month in the year when these people were not actively employed on the work, one-twelfth of the annual compensation would be deducted. So we put a proviso in this bill that the Attorney General shall pass upon all employment of attorneys and special counsel for the Shipping Board, and so we are assured that they will not get any more than the compensation fixed by the Attorney General's own office, no matter what the records of the hearings may show.

Now, that seems to have been the unanimous opinion at that time as to the wise course of procedure.

Mr. HARRISON. They lifted the pay for seven additional attorneys.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Was that approved by the Attorney General?

Mr. HARRISON. No; the Attorney General has not anything to do with this business, as I understand.

Mr. MANN. Does this carry a provision that these salaries must be approved by the Attorney General?

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think the salaries must be approved. I think he must approve the persons who are employed. I do not think the Attorney General has anything to do with the salaries.

Mr. MANN. I was under the impression that the law provides for that now, and that the present bill provides for it. I may be mistaken.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think there was some such proviso put on the last bill.

Mr. HARRISON. There was such a proviso, but my impression is that it was limited entirely to the employment of the lawyers.

Mr. OLIVER. There was a proviso put on by the House, but in conference the House yielded to an amendment put on by the Senate, in which they were permitted to employ a certain number, I think six, whose salaries should exceed the limitation that we fixed in the House.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I knew that limitation was here when we were discussing the bill on the floor, because I remember the discussion quite well.

Mr. HARRISON. In the hearings before the committee they did not seem to think it was necessary to have the approval of the Attorney General.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I agree with the gentleman that this litigation could be more economically and more efficiently conducted by the legal department of the Government. I believe it should be under the Attorney General, but I think there is something to be said for the amounts of the salaries paid. This is very largely admiralty litigation, in which the lawyers are more highly paid them in ordinary practice. These cases involve enormous amounts of money. The Government is opposed by lawyers of great ability who command large fees, and if the interests of the Government are to be properly protected we must have very able counsel, and I do not believe you can get counsel for less than $7,500 a year who are qualified to defend the Government properly in these suits; but I do agree with the gentleman that the business could be better conducted under the legal department of the Government. I think the Attorney General should have charge of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] has consumed one hour.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to myself 10 minutes more.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The present bill carries the provision which I said I thought it did, and which some members of the committee said it did not, that all of these contracts for the employment of attorneys shall be approved by the Attorney General of the United States. That is the existing law.

Mr. HARRISON. So far as I can find there has been no idea that the Attorney General had the right to fix the compensation.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman from Virginia yield so that I can ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Does that refer to counsel on the pay rolls of the Government, or does it refer to counsel in special cases?

Mr. MANN. I will give my friend from Massachusetts, who is a member of the committee, this information about the bill which his committee reported.

Mr. GALLIVAN. And from which I dissented as to this matter.

Mr. MANN. Then he ought to have known what was in it, if he dissented. The bill says "regular or special" contracts must be approved by the Attorney General. That is the existing law. I am not saying that the contracts ought not to be approved; but that is the situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. In answer to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED] a few moments ago, I will say that one of the "eminent counsel" whom they have employed was a second lieutenant in the adjutant general's office drawing $1,800 a year, and that he is now drawing $10,000 a year.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In view of what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has said, have these special attorneys been approved by the Attorney General?

Mr. HARRISON. I think it appears from the hearings that they have.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Have these additional six men been put on yet?

Mr. HARRISON. No; they have just got the authority. It appears from the hearings that the Attorney General has approved their employment, but I think that what is applicable to this case is applicable to all these bureaus. There are a number of attorneys employed in the business of the Alien Property Custodian. There are a number of attorneys employed in the Veterans' Bureau. There are a number of attorneys employed in every one of these agencies, and I believe it would be a great step in the direction of economy and a wise provision to require the Attorney General to take charge of all this legal business.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I agree with the gentleman that the law department of the Government ought to have charge of this, but the gentleman knows, and we all know, that if we should do that we would have to enlarge greatly the personnel of the Attorney General's Department.

Mr. HARRISON. We can do that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We would have to do it at once.

Mr. HARRISON. We have the authority here.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I know, but in my dealings with the office of the Attorney General I have found that every man down there seems to be crowded to death with matters pressing upon him at this time. You can hardly get anybody's attention there on an ordinary matter.

Mr. HARRISON. If we should take one-sixth of the $600,000 that we give to these attorneys in this department alone and give it to the Attorney General's office, I believe we could provide for the attorneys.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think so, too.

Mr. HARRISON. Then why not do it? Everybody has perfect confidence in the administration of the law in the department that is regularly charged with that duty. We have here simply the statements of the lawyers who are interested in the litigations, coming in and fixing their own fees for their own services at these enormous prices.

Mr. EDMONDS. There is one thing that the gentleman forgets. Of course, the Attorney General's office is not fit to deal with admiralty cases.

Mr. HARRISON. We can authorize the Attorney General to employ admiralty lawyers.

Mr. EDMONDS. You have got to get good admiralty lawyers, because most of these cases are admiralty cases.

Mr. HARRISON. Not all of them.

Mr. EDMONDS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that one man left the department then getting $8,500 a year and is now getting $50,000 a year in New York.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and a great many men left the Internal Revenue Department and are now getting big salaries.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not like to divert the gentleman from his line of argument, but I understand he has 10 minutes more. I would like to ask the gentleman this question: I see that under the Federal Trade Commission you allow $855,000. My information is that Mr. Dawes, of the Budget, asks for $955,000. I want to ask the gentleman why there was this cut of $100,000?

Mr. HARRISON. We investigated, and felt that they could get along with that sum.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to call attention to the fact that since this recommendation was made under the Ladd resolution they have imposed additional duties on the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the Grain Corporation, the Furniture Trust, and several other things. So I want to ask why you cut the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission, which has been giving valuable information to the country concerning the inner workings of our friends, the packers? Why did you cut this sum of $100,000 when they have had these additional duties put upon them?

Mr. HARRISON. I voted for every cut because no matter if they have had extra duties put upon them they have sufficient funds now.

Mr. HUDSPETH. In view of the fact that Mr. Dawes recommended $955,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I believe that all these commissions and activities in the past have received very liberal appropriations.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman did not vote blindly to cut this appropriation?

Mr. HARRISON. No; we went over them step by step, item by item.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield for me to answer the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I think the committee has done a good thing in limiting the appropriation for the Federal Trade Commission. It is claimed that they did so much in investigation in regard to the packers, but I happen to be on the committee and I heard these statements, and it was clearly shown that the Federal Trade Commission placed in the hands of a foreign Government all the secrets of the packers at a time when the result was most perilous to this country.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it would be well to take some of the money paid these high-priced attorneys and transfer it to the Federal Trade Commission?

Mr. HARRISON. As I understand it, the appropriations are ample to take care of the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What is the average salary being paid to these attorneys?

Mr. HARRISON. I should say about $650,000 to 78 attorneys.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then the average is about $8,000.

Mr. HARRISON. A little over $8,000.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The average salary paid to the Federal Trade Commission is about $3,200.

Mr. HARRISON. What I am criticizing is that the salaries are out of all proportion to the salaries of any other bureau, and that when there is the greatest depression in agricultural sections of the country that ever was known.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Let me ask the gentleman this: Is it not the policy of the committee to cut the appropriations and hamstring the Federal Trade Commission so that it can not function, and finally abolish it altogether?

Mr. HARRISON. It is not my intention, and if there is anything of that kind being developed I do not know it.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is not that the policy of the committee? The gentleman may not follow the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. I have seen no such indication. I think the members of the subcommittee went into these matters with a great deal of fairness and with an attempt to reach an economical result.

Now, I did intend to go into further details but I have promised time to other gentlemen, and I wish to call attention to the fact that these enormous appropriations of salaries and overhead costs are imposed on this country when the people of this country can not stand it. I represent an agricultural section, and I never in my life have known such depression. I have never seen the time when the farmers were so straitened as they are at this time. Gentlemen from industrial sections tell me that there is great depression in the industrial enterprises in this country. Here is an agency that might aid in the industrial life, an agency that might carry the farmers' products across the seas to peoples that wish to purchase them; an agency that might mean much to the factory and the mine, but, as now operated, burdened with overhead charges, instead of bringing relief to stagnant trade and the distressed conditions of the people adds enormously to the burdens of the taxpayers, and is a mere feeding trough for attorneys and functionaries of all kinds and descriptions.

We want a merchant marine to carry our trade upon the seas and bring prosperity to our shores. I have no doubt but that this agency, properly operated, can give us this. [Applause.]

NOTE 1.—This does not include seven additional attorneys provided for in the bill at salaries of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars each.

NOTE 2.—Salary increases are not fully noted. Advertising manager gets $10,000 and not $9,000 as given herein.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, under the new budgetary plan of procedure in presenting appropriation bills the pending bill carries appropriations for all independent offices under the Government. It carries $494,301,018. It appropriates money for the Alien Property Custodian, the Civil Service Commission, the Veterans' Bureau, the Shipping Board, and numerous other important activities, and to my mind is one of the most important appropriation bills that will be considered by Congress.

It is my purpose in the limited time I have at my disposal to discuss but one appropriation carried in this bill, and that relates to the Shipping Board. I would be glad, of course, to discuss some of the other appropriations, but I have not the time.

This bill carries for the Shipping Board for the fiscal year 1923 an appropriation of $100,459,000, $50,000,000 of which, as was explained by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] yesterday, is to be devoted to the payment of claims, and another $50,000,000 to the operation of the ships and to the business of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. The $459,000 relates to the expenses of the United States Shipping Board, including the salaries of the members of the board. That is not all that the bill carries. It provides for the use of the balance on hand June 30, 1922, the receipts from operations during the fiscal year, and carries an indefinite appropriation as follows:

(d) Fifty-five million dollars from moneys collected from mortgages, leases, accounts and bills receivable other than those arising from current operations, and from moneys collected from the sale of ships, plants, material, securities, and other assets prior to July 1, 1923, less such portion of said $55,000,000 which shall have been collected during the fiscal year 1922 under the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1921.

In other words, the appropriation made for the current fiscal year gives to the Shipping Board the right to trench upon not exceeding $55,000,000 which may be collected from sales and mortgages and other obligations, to which I have just referred. It is stated that it is expected that by July 1 possibly $20,000,000 to $25,000,000 will be collected from those sources and will be applied to the appropriations of the current year. That will leave certainly $30,000,000, and perhaps more, which, if collected during 1923, may be applied to the fiscal year 1923. Just how much we do not know. As gentlemen know, I have consistently for several years opposed that sort of appropriation. I do not think that it is good business to appropriate indefinite, unascertained sums. I think that the proper way to make appropriations is to appropriate a definite and exact sum for the particular activity for which you are appropriating and to provide that any money that may be collected from any source by any particular Government activity shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. It is only in that way that Congress and the people can really understand what these activities are expending from year to year. Certainly no one has denounced indefinite appropriations in stronger terms than the present chairman of the Shipping Board, Mr. Lasker. If gentlemen will recall, in his hearings on the deficiency appropriation bill in July last, he appealed to the committee and the Congress to repeal that portion of the appropriation which gave to the Shipping Board the right to use these indefinite amounts. He said that it made for waste. He said that it made for inefficiency. He said that it was a temptation to those in power to dispose of the assets of the Government at possibly a reduced cost, or a less cost, than ought to be obtained in order to get the money necessary to carry on their work. He appealed to Congress in those hearings to repeal that portion of the appropriation for this year and to give the Shipping Board a direct appropriation for whatever amount Congress felt was necessary to carry on its operations during this fiscal year.

That was not done at that time because Congress had already made the appropriation, but I was somewhat surprised when I read these hearings and when the bill was considered in full committee to learn that the subcommittee had proposed exactly the kind of appropriation which was so very much condemned by Mr. Lasker, and the full committee has so reported it to the House. More than that, we are doing it in this instance at his especial request, because there came from the Shipping Board a request to the committee to permit the Shipping Board to use whatever unexpended balances there may be of the $55,000,000 during the year 1923.

Another thing which shows this form of appropriation to be wrong in principle is the fact that we are here confronted with estimates for the Shipping Board for the fiscal year 1923 of $100,000,000. That is all that the Book of Estimates shows. The country has been told that the Shipping Board needs for the next fiscal year only the $100,000,000, which is being directly appropriated, and yet, if this bill passes as it is proposed here, we will be in the act of appropriating possibly $30,000,000 more than the estimates call for and the country has been told the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation will need for the next fiscal year. If we are going to keep correct balances and books as to these activities, I insist that the splendid beginning which the Committee on Appropriations and which Congress made with reference to making direct appropriations and covering in these collections as miscellaneous receipts should be continued in this bill as well as in all the other bills of Congress, and when the time comes I propose to move to strike that particular indefinite appropriation from the bill.

We have heard a great deal of criticism of the Shipping Board, not only during this discussion but in all previous discussions, practically ever since the Shipping Board was organized. One can take these hearings and he will find that hardly a witness appears before the committee who did not either directly or indirectly criticize former boards. While he was particular to disclaim any intention of criticizing any predecessor, yet there is running through the entire hearings a criticism of the past administration of this board, a criticism of those who had charge of its administration in the past years, and my friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] yesterday could not deny himself the privilege of criticizing the past administration of the Shipping Board. He said that the administration of the past board had been rotten, and that the present board had put it on an efficient basis. What are the facts? What has this new board, which has been in power for more than six months, done to change the administration of the past board? I have before me a statement that was issued by Mr. Lasker to the press last night. I have read it, and in that statement I find that he takes credit for only two things, or possibly three. He takes credit, in the first place, for the fact that the Appropriations Committee has allowed every dollar for which the Shipping Board has asked. Then he takes credit for the fact that he has built up, as he says, a perfect technical organization which did not exist in the Shipping Board prior to his taking charge. We know what kind of an organization he has built up. That has been explained to you very fully by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON]. Mr. Lasker has built up a certain organization by employing men of high salaries, two of them drawing $35,000 a year, another one $30,000 a year, and two of them $25,000 a year, and dozens and scores of them at $10,000 and $11,000 a year. He further takes credit for the fact that he has had an inventory made of the assets of the Shipping Board. And yet we know he had this done by a special accounting firm at an expense of hundreds of thousand of dollars.

Those are the only credits that the chairman of the Shipping Board claims for what he has done in the last six months. What change has there been made in the administration which my friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] denounced yesterday as rotten? As was suggested a while ago, a part of that administration were the very same three high operatives who are employed now at an aggregate salary of $95,000 a year. They were a part for a time of the administration of the past board and, of course, are responsible for some of the administration of that board. Have they changed the M. O. 4 contract which Mr. Lasker denounced in August as being actually vicious, making, as he said, for not only inefficiency but for utter and entire waste of Government money? If I had the time, I could refer you to the hearings, where Mr. Lasker denounced that form of contract as vicious and as showing utter incapacity upon the part of those who made it.

He was followed by Mr. Smull, a man drawing $35,000 a year under the present administration, who likewise denounced that form of contract. He made the statement that there were three things that could be done. He said they could go to a bareboat charter, which was impossible on account of the present condition of the shipping trade; that they could make a contract on a partnership basis, whereby operators would agree to share a part of the expenses, or they could continue the present form of contract. He said it was his purpose, and Mr. Lasker corroborated him, to do away with these M. O. 4 contracts. He said if he could not do that he proposed to tie up these ships rather than to continue them.

Have they done that? They are operating under the same contract to-day that was put into effect by the old Shipping Board. More than 327 ships are being operated in various ports of the world under this same M. O. 4 contract. It is said that they have put in some improvements; that they are keeping closer check upon it and making a closer survey of the expenses, and so on. I dare say if you would ask the members of the old board they would tell you that they had a close surveillance of the old contracts. And I cite this to show that in spite of the promises and boasts that have been made in the papers of what would be done immediately upon the appointment of a new Shipping Board, not a single change, in so far as the operation of these ships is concerned, has been made, but we are pursuing the same old policy under the same old contracts established by the old Shipping Board, which my friend from Indiana says was rotten.

Now, my friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] forgot that, as a matter of fact, until the present Shipping Board was appointed there had been no Shipping Board for practically an entire year. You gentlemen will recall that the Jones-Edmonds shipping act was passed some time in June, 1920. President Wilson appointed some time thereafter members of the board, but the Senate of the United States, with a Republican majority at the time, saw fit not to confirm the nominations sent in, preferring to wait until a Republican President should be inaugurated, so that he could make the appointments. I am not criticizing that so much, but I say that under the circumstances gentlemen ought not on this floor to criticize a board which really during all that time had no real authority to act, because they were not actually confirmed. You gentlemen will remember that from March 4 until the time of the appointment of this new Shipping Board, a period of three or four months, we did not have a single member on that board. Admiral Benson, a member and chairman of the old board, was requested by the President to act as his special agent, and took charge of the Shipping Board and its operations as best he could under his limited and uncertain authority.

The gentleman from Indiana says there was a great deal of confusion in the past administration; that there were no records kept, and that that has been corrected under the present administration. Well, we all know that there was a great deal of confusion during the years of the war. We know that money was spent for ships and in the construction of ships, in order to bring about early completion, that no one would have thought of spending in peace times. We know that we were told by Mr. Lasker in the hearings on the deficiency bill that actually during the period of the war, and purposely, many of the sailings of these vessels were kept from the record in order not to give our enemy information as to where our ships were going and with what they were loaded, on account of the fear that they might be submarined. We were told that for that reason there were 6,000 voyages out of the 9,000 that had not been fully accounted for. I do not know whether they have been accounted for up to this time or not. As I read these hearings I find there is no definite, positive statement made that all of those voyages have been accounted for by the present administration. If I am mistaken as to that, I will be glad to be corrected.

There has been another change in the administration. We now have an Emergency Fleet Corporation, not run by the Shipping Board, but the chairman of the board has constituted himself, as he had a right to do, chairman of the board of trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Then he has appointed six high-salaried vice presidents, among them these three operators to whom I have referred, who with him constitute the board of trustees, and are charged with the duty and responsibility of operating our fleet.

We all know that the board of trustees really operates that fleet, and the hearings disclose, in my judgment, reading between the lines, that the Shipping Board has absolutely nothing to do with the policy of operating the fleet. I do not know that that is bad policy, but I do say this, that if we are going to practice economy and if that is the proper policy, then the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries ought to bring in legislation abolishing this Shipping Board and provide for one man, and give him a salary that is commensurate with his duties and responsibility, and do away with these other six members to whom we are paying $12,000 a year each.

Now, much has been said in regard to the high salaries that are being paid, and I dare say that in all the history of this Nation there has never been an activity of this Government operating under a lump sum which has shown so little regard for the Treasury as has the present Shipping Board on the question of fixing salaries. I have told you that there were two who were drawing $35,000 a year each, and, as was stated awhile ago, these two same gentlemen were formerly with the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation at less than $10,000 a year salary, if my recollection is correct. There is 1 at $30,000; there are 2 at $25,000; 7 commissioners at $12,000; there are 15 at $11,000, 8 of whom are attorneys; there is 1 at $10,800; there are 19 at $10,000, 9 of whom are attorneys; there is 1 at $9,500 who is an attorney; there are 7 at $9,000, 1 of whom is an attorney; there are 8 at $8,500, 2 of whom are attorneys; there are 2 at $8,000; there are 2 at $7,800; there are 29 at $7,500, 6 of whom are attorneys; there is 1 at $7,200; there is 1 at $7,000; there are 7 at $6,500; there are 49 at $6,000, 9 of whom are attorneys; there is 1 at $5,600; 5 at $5,500; 7 at $5,400, 1 of whom is an attorney; there are 43 at $5,000, 7 of whom are attorneys; 18 at $4,800; 46 at $4,500, 3 of whom are attorneys; 61 at $4,200; 8 at $4,140; 18 at $4,000, 8 of whom are attorneys; 79 at $3,900, 3 of whom are attorneys; 142 at $3,600, 9 of whom are attorneys; 6 at $3,500, 1 of whom is an attorney; and 74 at $3,300, besides a horde of employees at $3,000 and less.

I say to you, gentlemen, that there never was in the history of Congress such a salary roll as that presented to Congress, and yet that is the salary roll that the Chief of the Shipping Board, Mr. Lasker, approves, and that is the salary roll that he intends to continue during the fiscal year 1922-23 under this appropriation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Was there any attempt made by the Committee on Appropriations to place any limitation in this act on the number of people who receive that kind of salaries?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. There is a limitation in the bill referring to attorneys. That is the limitation which provides that the Attorney General must first approve the contracts made for special and regular attorneys.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Is that the only limitation that was suggested in the committee?

Mr. HARRISON. There is a limitation as to the number that can be employed at over $11,000 each.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes. There is a limitation in this bill that there shall be not exceeding 13 employees above $11,000 each. The present law provides that there shall not be over 6 at $11,000.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What do these high-salaried people do, so many of them, to justify the Committee on Appropriations in bringing a bill in here without additional limitations?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has asked a question that I would like to yield to somebody to answer, because I must confess to the gentleman that I have no answer for it. My own position is that these salaries are all out of reason. I know that it is said you have to pay big salaries to get men of broad qualifications, but that is the old plea and the old claim that is made to Congress about every appropriation and every salary that is ever proposed.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Was anything developed in the hearings showing the salaries paid to executive officers, men in charge of private concerns?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not in these hearings.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For instance, what salary is a man by the name of Frankland drawing, who is chairman of the board of directors or managing officer of some large shipping concern?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am not able to give the gentleman that information.

Now, it is said that these salaries are justified as to the attorneys because these claims aggregate $300,000,000, and that the Government, of course, should have the very best legal talent possible to compete with those who represent the claimants. But we all know, gentlemen, that the Government can not undertake to compete with claimants who have these great big claims in the payment of fees to attorneys. All of these claims involve, I think, only questions of fact.

I dare say there are few real legal problems involved in these claims—all the legal problems have been settled in some way or other by previous decisions of the courts. After all, they are simply claims filed for the cancellation of contracts and other matters growing out of the operations of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, which involve purely questions of fact. In the salaries of attorneys in the Department of Justice for the transaction of its business, involving as it does the enforcement of the antitrust law and new laws passed by Congress, and all sorts of difficult legal problems, no one has ever suggested paying to those attorneys salaries such as are being paid by the Shipping Board for their corps of attorneys.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And it is perfectly obvious that the questions they have to settle are new and vastly more important and difficult than those that come before the attorneys of the Shipping Board.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman is correct. That is what I was trying to say, that the questions coming before the attorneys of the Department of Justice are, many of them, new ones, involving new constructions and interpretations of law, and yet no one has ever proposed to pay those attorneys anything like the salaries that are being paid by the Shipping Board. The committee, if it had followed the request and the recommendation of the general counsel of the Shipping Board, would have allowed over $100,000 more, and I am not so certain that he will not use the $100,000 in employing more attorneys, because while there is a limitation upon employing more than 13 at $11,000, there is no limitation as to the number of attorneys whom he can employ in the prosecution of these claims.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Has the gentleman's committee, under the law, the right to segregate these appropriations for the Shipping Board?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. They could be segregated in any way Congress chooses to segregate them.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Has your committee now the power to do that?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I know of no law that would prevent it.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Then the Committee on Appropriations could withhold these salaries, could they?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Congress can either withhold the salaries or fix the salaries, if it chooses. But here is something which the gentleman should consider. Here are about 3,500 cases. It is absolutely impossible for Congress to designate just how many attorneys shall be employed to look into those cases. It is absolutely impossible for Congress to fix the salary of every attorney that is employed. We must in the end, or at least to some extent, trust those——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. May I have 10 minutes more?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. We must to some extent trust those who are in charge of the administration, and the point of my criticism is that those in charge of the present administration of the Shipping Board have shown absolutely no inclination whatever to conserve the public money, but they are building up a great personnel down there at high salaries, taking these men at the instance of attorneys in New York and in Chicago and other places and putting them in there on salaries out of all proportion to those paid for more important and difficult work. It is shown in these hearings that some of these attorneys in 1917 and as late as 1919 were drawing only $1,500 a year. Yet they are now drawing $3,600 and $3,900 a year. Some of them have been in the practice of law only two or three years, and yet they are put on at $3,600 and $3,900 and even $6,500. Some of them have had no experience to speak of in the practice of the law, and yet they are being put on at these high salaries.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not the expectation that the employment of this large number of attorneys will result in clearing up and terminating these claims in question that have been pending there for several years?

Mr. HARRISON. This appropriation is for the year beginning July 1, 1923, so that it is not expected that they will clear them up this year.

Mr. WALSH. That is true.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is expected that if this $50,000,000 is allowed for the settlement of claims, they will be able to reduce the attorney personnel after the next fiscal year possibly one-half. The gentleman, of course, can see that that can be done very readily, because as they settle these claims they will need fewer attorneys.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman stated that there never was in the history of the Congress such a pay roll as has been submitted by the Shipping Board. Does the gentleman mean in the salaries paid or in the number of the employees?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was referring to the salaries paid. There is not an activity of this Government that is paying anything like the salaries that are being paid by the present Shipping Board. We know that the old administration did not do it. I am not here to defend the old Shipping Board. There were many criticisms that were made of that board to which I gave assent, but the old Shipping Board never built up anything like the organization that has been built up by this present Shipping Board within the last six months, and, as appears from the hearings, absolutely nothing has been done up to this time which changes the policy of the administration as it was conducted under the old board, either with reference to the operation of ships or with reference to the payment of these claims, except to employ high-salaried men.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman will admit though that the present Shipping Board have reduced their employee force about 5,000, and they have reduced their pay roll by a little over $4,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think they have reduced the number of their employees a little over 3,000.

Mr. EDMONDS. And the pay roll about $4,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I forget the amount of the pay roll; but the gentleman will recall that that reduction has come about largely by the tying up of ships. They have tied up more than half the ships which were in operation on July 1, 1921; and naturally, of course, the large operating force on those ships has been cut down.

Mr. EDMONDS. I agree with the gentleman, but the office force has been reduced.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not to that extent.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; to that extent; because I have the report from the office to show that. The operation of ships is outside of that.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. My understanding is that the reduction in force has come largely from the tying up of ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman will find that there has been a reduction in the office force which has reduced the pay rolls $4,000,000. The operation of ships is entirely outside of that.

Mr. MANN. The laying up of a ship operated under an M. O. 4 contract would not reduce the number of employees of the department.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes; it would.

Mr. MANN. Not the operating end of it, anyhow.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Not the operating end of it, I agree with the gentleman; but it would necessarily reduce the force here.

Mr. MANN. It would permit them to reduce.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Because they would not have anything like the number of voyage accounts and such things to look after.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DICKINSON. No other department of the Government has had such a problem, involving the amounts of money or the intricate transactions that this department has had to work out.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That may be true, but I do not think we are going to relieve the situation by undertaking to match the salaries of the attorneys employed by the Government with those paid by claimants or litigants. I can not for the life of me understand how it is possible to say that we are going to get any better service out of some of these men, who now get $7,500 or $11,000, which is the limit with the exception of two or three, by allowing seven additional at $15,000 or over, as is proposed in this bill, especially when it appears, and the testimony shows, that dozens of them were drawing only $1,500 or $2,000 two and three years ago, as the gentleman will remember.

Mr. DICKINSON. That was when they entered the service, four years ago.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield if I have the time. There is another subject I want to discuss.

Mr. OLIVER. A number of inquiries have been directed to the gentleman by lawyers in the House, and I think it would be very helpful to the lawyers who are considering this pay schedule for the lawyers of the Shipping Board if they will read pages 1038 and 1039, where is set forth the character of the litigations which they say they have to handle. I believe that the lawyers of the House will agree with me that the cases that are there cited as the exceptional cases, involving intricate questions of admiralty law and other law, will appear to be not very difficult of solution. I simply refer any lawyer in the House to the reading of a page and a half of the statement of these exceptional cases that they think offer such difficult problems to solve.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps the gentleman has had more time to investigate the hearings as to the Shipping Board than I have. Can he explain why the claims section of the War Department, dealing with war claims, have virtually finished their work, whereas the claims section of the Shipping Board seem to have left their work in about the same condition as it was in former years?

Mr. DICKINSON. They have not had any authority to settle the claims.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The difficulty about that is this: In the first place, if they had the authority they did not have the money with which to settle them. While some claims have been settled these $300,000,000 of claims are now pressing, involving 3,500 actions in the courts, and are just now coming on for trial and consideration by the courts. I am sorrry that I have not time to discuss this matter further.

There is another matter that I want to discuss and that is the enormous expense that is being indulged in in advertising. The chairman of the Shipping Board is the owner of the Lord & Thomas Advertising Agency at Chicago and has made a tremendous success of it and made a great fortune out of that business, but he has what would appear to me, a mere layman, to be an exaggerated view of the importance of spending large sums of money by way of advertising. It seems to me it is beyond all reason to spend the sum of $900,000 for the purpose of advertising for passenger ships alone, especially when we have an advertising section within the Shipping Board headed by Mr. Clausson, who, by the way, I understand, was the publicity agent of the Hamburg-American Line, a German organization, before we entered the war, and who is drawing $9,000 a year on the Shipping Board, and other employees drawing salaries aggregating $27,500, in addition to a publicity agent drawing $6,000 a year. I am informed that definite charges were made to the Attorney General's office that Mr. Lasker had ignored a resolution adopted by the Shipping Board which called upon him to present a country-wide survey on advertising made by 134 of the leading advertising agents of America representing every State in the Union; and that he entered into a contract with the Gunlach Advertising Agency at Chicago, and proposed that Gunlach take into his organization a man named Carey, who would furnish the capital to enable him to carry on the contract. I have been informed that this $900,000 has been allocated to this advertising agent, Gunlach, or the Gunlach Advertising Agency, of Chicago, Ill. Who Mr. Gunlach is I do not know. My information is that prior to the allocation of this great amount and the contract authorizing him to expend $900,000 he had a comparatively small advertising agency in the city of Chicago which dealt particularly with mail-order houses, and was more particularly engaged in sending out boiler-plate matter to the country newspapers, and that he had a small, insignificant office in the city of New York. But after this contract was made he opened very sumptuous offices in the city of New York.

My information is—it does not appear from the hearings, because, I regret to say the hearings do not go particularly into the way the money is to be expended—but my information is that the Gunlack Advertising Agency is to get from 10 to 15 per cent commission for the advertising, which would amount to over $100,000, and in addition to that 5 per cent is to be paid for discount for cash; that the Shipping Board has turned over to the agency in advance $100,000 with which they paid cash for the advertising. It is estimated that the 5 per cent will amount to $50,000, which, it should be noted, is earned by paying cash with Government money. In addition to that he is given the privilege of making his own art work, which costs very little but on which he will get a commission of 10 per cent. I can understand, if these facts are true, how that agency, which was a small agency and which will make between $200,000 and $300,000 out of the $900,000, can provide sumptuous offices in New York and also in Chicago. But the unexplained mystery is why such a small and hitherto unknown advertising agency was ever selected or why such large commissions are to be paid.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman does not care to do Mr. Lasker or anybody else an injustice?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Of course not.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The statement the gentleman makes is based on an article published in the New York World. I have the facts in reference to the amount of money and the facts with reference to the advertising agency, and I wish to say that I have a statement from Mr. Lasker, which I will read into the RECORD at the proper time, which says that every statement made in the article referred to is absolutely false—a lie made out of whole cloth. The amount of advertising that was placed through the Gunlack service for six months after December 31 was $125,505.40—that is, they placed that amount of advertising, and the amount received for placing it was $18,825.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. What we are interested to know is what the contract is in the future. My understanding of the article to which the gentleman refers is that under the contract Gunlack is to have the entire charge of the advertising on the part of the Shipping Board. It is stated in the hearings that it is proposed to expend $900,000 for that purpose. I regret to say that the hearings do not show how it is to be expended.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will read the hearings on that subject he will find how they are to expend it and how they are to check up on it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have read the hearings; the subject is discussed on pages 933 to 937, inclusive, and 1152; but there is nothing to show how it is to be expended. Mr. Lasker is singularly silent about the Gunlack advertising agency. He does not even mention it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They say that the article in the World is false from the beginning to end, and I will place in the RECORD the exact facts in relation to the Gunlack contract.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the advertising include the preparation of statements that are typewritten and mimeographed and issued to newspapers? Does that come under the title of advertising?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know. I take it that those may be prepared by the publicity agent, who is drawing $6,000 a year, and Mr. Claussen, who is getting $9,000 a year, because if they do not do that I can not understand just what they do for the Shipping Board. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TILSON having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I regret exceedingly that constant and necessary attendance upon another subcommittee of the main Committee on Appropriations, namely, the subcommittee in charge of the preparation of the appropriations for the legislative establishment, for a full week past has prevented me from giving as much time and attention to this bill as perhaps I ought to have given, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] who criticized me for dissenting from an appropriation about which he thought I did not know as much as I ought to know was correct in his criticism. When I tell him that I have been working in another subcommittee of my full committee day and night for a week perhaps he will understand that I can not be in two places at one time.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I hope the gentleman will permit me to say that I had no intention of ever criticizing the gentleman, whom I greatly admire.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, because I have been working on another appropriation bill, which will be reported within 48 hours, I have not had an opportunity, as I have said, to pay as much attention to the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation as I wanted to. May I say to the Members of the House present that I hold no brief and never held any brief for the old Shipping Board? I was a member of the committee which had charge of their appropriations, and I always agreed with the then chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Good, in his criticisms of the old Shipping Board. I do not believe he ever overstepped the mark, and I am not prepared to say that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] overstepped the mark yesterday when he said that the old Shipping Board had left behind it a condition of rottenness almost indescribable.

But I know enough about the new Shipping Board to say that I would not give them a dollar if it were within my sole power; that I would find some way to close up the whole rotten outfit, despite the gentleman from Chicago, the new chairman, Mr. Lasker, who stands in a position of preeminence and poses, as he has posed from the day he came to Washington, as the man who is going to "shake a magic wand" to change conditions which, as described by the gentleman from Indiana, were always conditions of rottenness. If gentlemen will read the hearings and the boastings of the new chairman of the Shipping Board, as he took up one department after another and put his witness on the stand, to undergo the splendid cross-examination of my friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], they will find that Mr. Lasker always praised the new find which he had discovered as the head of this department or the head of that department; and yet, if you put your nose close enough into the whole matter you will find also where under the old Shipping Board men were getting $2,500 a year in minor jobs, under this outfit they are getting $7,500 a year in major jobs.

When I said a moment ago to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. WASON] something about the $35,000 men, I did not mean to say that they were lawyers. They are supposed to be shipping experts, but it should be remembered that we had $20,000 and $25,000 lawyers brought in here over a year ago, but their salaries were reduced to $11,000 a year. Despite the claim that they are supposed to earn $100,000 a year and $150,000 a year at home, they stayed on the job here, even though the salaries were reduced to $11,000 a year.

My colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], as the latter was closing, whether or not certain press matter—I think he referred to it as that—was paid for out of the advertising appropriation of $900,000 which has been most properly criticized, and to which I intend, if I have the time, to pay my respects before I finish. I do not know, nor does the gentleman from Tennessee know. I find that they have a division of information in the Shipping Board, but whether or not it is a part of this advertising publicity outfit as yet I have been unable to discover.

The division of information is a very important division; very important. It keeps the country posted on where the hundreds of millions of dollars that are appropriated for by this bill are being expended, and I suppose it is established and is being carried on to ease the minds of the anxious taxpayers who may be worried about whether or not their money is being properly expended. I hold in my hand, on the official paper of the United States Shipping Board, a most important pronunciamento from the division of information of the United States Shipping Board.

Mr. Chairman, 107,000,000 people, with bated breath and open ear and worried eye, waited for this information for weeks, and at last, after the official of the Shipping Board had revised the original copy which he had sent to the press on Tuesday of this week, he issued orders that this copy should be released, so that from the Atlantic to the Pacific the worried taxpayer would know what the Shipping Board is doing with the hundreds of millions of dollars—and I refer to the new Shipping Board, the chairman of which has found a magic wand. Here, gentlemen, is this important communication issued officially from the division of information.

(Division of Information. Room 2904, Navy Building. Phone Main 5201, branch 1719. United States Shipping Board, Washington. Revised copy, 1–16–22.)

Over in the left-hand corner appears evidently the name of the man who wrote this, "Murtaugh." On the other side of the sheet of paper, opposite the name, heavily typewritten and underscored is the magic word "society." Now permit me to read this important pronunciamento which the division of information, with some of this $900,000 I dare say, gave to the country on that eventful day, for we are informed that it was to be released on Tuesday, January 17, 1922.

Former Solicitor General and Mrs. William Marshall Bullitt, of Louisville, Ky., entertained a company of 44 guests at their residence, 1717 I Street NW., last night, in honor of the Chief Justice and Mrs. Taft. Ophelia roses and budlea were profusely used in carrying out the general scheme of pink and white decorations that prevailed. Seldom has a more brilliant assemblage of women and men been seen in Washington. [Laughter.] The gathering represented not only some of the most distinguished women in Washington and other cities but also the leaders of the American bar in all sections of the country.

Now comes a bit of information which I particularly wish you to distinctly mark:

Mr. and Mrs. Bullitt gave the dinner in appreciation of the many courtesies that were shown them while Chief Justice Taft was President of the United States.

How the taxpayers of the country must have been relieved when they learned that fact. [Laughter.]

To continue:

The guests included the Chief Justice and Mrs. Taft; the Secretary of State and Mrs. Hughes; the Attorney General, Mr. Daugherty; Mrs. Marshall Field; Senator GEORGE WHARTON PEPPER and Mrs. Pepper, of Philadelphia; former Attorney General and Mrs. George W. Wickersham, of New York; former Solicitor General and Mrs. Lawrence Maxwell, of Cincinnati; Mr. John Barton Payne, of Chicago; Mrs. Truxton Beale, Washington, D. C.; Mr. and Mrs. Paul D. Cravath, of New York; Mr. and Mrs. Richard Lindabury, of Newark; Mr. and Mrs. Henry S. Priest, of St. Louis; Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Squire, of Cleveland; Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Severance, of St. Paul; Mr. and Mrs. Levy Mayer, of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. Silas H. Strawn, of Chicago; Mr. and Mrs. Walker D. Hines, of New York; Mr. and Mrs. James Byrne, of New York; Mr. Allan McCulloh, of New York; Mme. Hauge, Washington, D. C.; Mr. J. M. Hartfield, of New York; Mrs. King Carley, Washington, D. C.—

And at last I find a man from my own town—

Mr. Frederick P. Fish, of Boston—

A very fine gentleman, by the way.

Let me continue with the list, so that all may be included:

Miss Mabel Boardman, Washington, D. C.; Mr. J. G. Milburn, of New York; and Mrs. George Vanderbilt, Washington, D. C.

Now, gentlemen, that is on the official paper of the Shipping Board, issued by the Division of Information, especially revised. Mr. Bullitt is one of the high-salaried attorneys. I do not believe for a single moment that any man in that press gallery went up to the Division of Information looking for that sort of stuff. If he did, he might have gotten an original copy; but he never went up to get a revised copy. I have looked up the pay rolls to find out who this man Murtaugh is, and I find that he is rated as a senior examiner at $5,000 a year, and was appointed in November, 1921. Whether he is a senior examiner of Ophelia roses and budlea I have not been able as yet to determine. [Laughter.] If he is an authority on carrying out to perfection the scheme of pink and white decorations at pink tea parties, then I say more power to him. [Laughter.] But what in the name of all that is good and holy do we want him in the Shipping Board for?

I want to say to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that he made a very proper inquiry when he wanted to know if that is why we are giving them $900,000 for advertising and publicity. To-day I received a letter from one of the most prominent men in my own city, Mr. J. Linfield Damon, jr., protesting against this extravagant expenditure of $900,000 in advertising travel to foreign countries. He says:

The spending of public money for such a purpose, when the entire country is groaning under burdens of overtaxation, is unfair and unjust to every taxpayer throughout the Nation.

What will he say when he learns that a part of that sum of $900,000 is spent in advertising "Ophelia"?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish I had time to tell this House something about the jockeying and the criss-crossing which has been going on in connection with the reconditioning of the Leviathan by this new outfit. Over a year ago they asked for bids for this work, and there were, I think, about two real bids submitted, one by the Todd Shipbuilding Co., which was for $10,000,000, approximately, and one by the Boston Navy Yard, or, rather, an estimate, for $8,000,000—$2,000,000 under what the private shipbuilding outfit was willing to undertake the job. Nothing came of it, because the private shipbuilding interests would not permit this thing to be done in a Government establishment. Why were the private interests opposed to having this work done by Government employees? The Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation and the Navy Department in all human probability had more than enough material to contribute to the equipment and the reconditioning of this ship, and this expense would have been saved to the Government. So in all probability most of the expense would have been for labor. The Boston Navy Yard, as I have said, made a bid $2,000,000 less than the bid of the private company and was the lowest bidder. But nothing came of it. The Massachusetts Members of this Congress, Senators and Representatives, for a year have struggled, and the mayor of my city and the mayors of the cities surrounding Boston have struggled to get this outfit, this wonderful Shipping Board, to be on the level with the men in the Navy Department, whether in Massachusetts or elsewhere, and give them an opportunity to bid for the reconditioning of this ship. But the private shipbuilding interests have this outfit by the throat, as they had the other crowd. They refused to let the Boston Navy Yard or any other navy yard make a bid when bids were asked for in December.

Now, remember, gentlemen, if I am partial as to my own city, I have good reason. We have the only dry dock on the Atlantic coast in Boston where this ship can be conditioned. I read in the evidence that in all probability, while I am talking, the contract has been awarded to the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., and I read that Mr. Powell, of the Emergency Ship Fleet, was asked as to what dry dock they would have to use; when asked if they had one in Newport News, he replied, "No; in all probability we will have to send her to Boston, unless the Newport dock can take care of her." He knows that the Boston Dry Dock is the only one that the Leviathan can set herself comfortably in. Yet because these private interests got together, and, I am afraid, influenced men in the activities of the Government in this hour who are not connected with the Shipping Board, the navy-yard men, the skilled organizations which have done their bit in their way during the World War, and who are being kicked out by the hundreds every day and every night from our navy yards, these private organizations have gotten together and have stopped the Boston Navy Yard, and every other navy yard, from being permitted to submit an estimate, because they knew that the navy yards would be the lowest bidders. And I am extremely sorry that Secretary Denby permitted himself to be made the cat's-paw for the private interests. They have "passed the buck" to Denby, and you will be told later on by some apologist for this Shipping Board that the Navy chiefs did not want to undertake such a big job.

Secretary Denby wrote a letter, which is printed on page 1163 of the records of these hearings, in which he explains why the navy yards could not, perhaps, meet the requirements. As a matter of fact, he did not know the situation at all. What do you think the employees of the Boston Navy Yard did, gentlemen? Within a month, when the answers were made that the Boston Navy Yard could not recondition the Leviathan within the bid, those employees agreed to set aside every month out of their wages a certain percentage of every man's salary in the navy yard and have it as a sinking fund to meet any overcharge that might come because they had exceeded their original bid, if such a thing should happen. They have done everything humanly possible to try to get the Leviathan into the proper place, the only dry dock where she can fit in; they wanted to save the Government $2,000,000 and keep their organization together. The men have been willing to make every sacrifice possible, but they have been spurned by Lasker and company.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have not, as I said before, had the opportunity that I wanted in which to prepare a few remarks on this appropriation. I dissented from the entire appropriation, and if I get an opportunity I shall vote against giving one dollar for the Shipping Board or for the Emergency Fleet Corporation until they come here with clean hands, and I hope that in so doing I shall not deprive the readers of the society news in the Washington papers of hereafter learning more about Ophelia roses and budleas. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, in a discussion of our prodigious merchant marine problem perhaps it is not amiss to refer briefly to our shipping history. Beginning with colonial times, through the period of 1812, on through the golden era of the twenties, thirties, and forties, when the American clippers were the pride of the sea, on through the fifties, and down to the Civil War, this country was a shipbuilding, ship-owning, ship-sailing, and ship-loving Nation.

The 1921 report of the United States Commissioner of Navigation gives in detail the United States imports and exports and the amounts carried in American vessels and in foreign vessels from 1821 to 1921. I shall not weary you by quoting from this report in dollars or tonnage, but I do call your attention to the percentage of United States imports and exports carried in American bottoms in certain years scattered over the last century, as follows:

Per cent in American vessels.

1826	92.5
1830	89.9
1835	84.5
1840	83.3
1846	81.7
1850	72.5
1855	75.6
1860	66.5
1870	35.6
1875	26.2
1880	17.4
1890	12.5
1900	9.3
1910	8.7
1914	9.7
1916	16.3
1917	18.6
1919	27.8

The percentage of our imports and exports carried in American ships, especially Shipping Board vessels, rapidly declined during 1921. For instance, in December, 1920, 66 per cent of our imports were carried in American vessels and only 34 per cent in foreign vessels, whereas in July, 1921, only 46 per cent of our imports were carried in American vessels and 54 per cent in foreign vessels. The decline from then on was still greater.

The question is often asked as to the reason for the decline in the American merchant marine and the percentage of our imports and exports carried in American vessels as evidenced by the figures just quoted. Different theories have been advanced. Bates's American Navigation discusses this question. Chairman Lasker recognizes the high character and reliability of this work by quoting from it at length in a report prepared at his instance. I wish to quote from an extract from the said Bates's American Navigation, carried in the said Lasker report, where, in a discussion of the reasons for the decline of American shipping, Mr. Bates says:

A most effective cause for the decline was the protective tariff, which stimulating American manufacturers had induced capital to enter that field. The protected shipping industry naturally suffered for lack of capital. The price of shipbuilding materials was naturally increased by the tariff. Steel plates in 1903 were selling for $41.40 in America, $25.50 in England, and $30.23 in Germany. * * *

The tariff has restricted the number and amount of cargoes that American ships could bring from foreign ports. That condition will always be present in the face of a high tariff. The price of labor has also been higher in the United States, but the testimony introduced before various commissions would indicate that the increased cost of manning an American vessel has been greatly exaggerated, amounting to not more than 10 per cent.

In this connection it is important to bear in mind that the cost of manning an American cargo vessel does not exceed 10 per cent of the total cost of operation; many authorities place it as low as 5 per cent. Consequently, the difference between the total cost of the operation of an American vessel and the cost of the operation of a foreign vessel does not exceed 1 per cent.

In corroboration of the correctness of the explanation of "a most effective cause for the decline" of our American shipping thus given by Mr. Bates—which is quoted, apparently with approval, by Chairman Lasker—your attention is called to the significant fact that the golden era of the American merchant marine was prior to the advent of a high protective tariff, and that American shipping declined as the tariff duties increased, until under the operation of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law the percentage of our imports and exports carried in American vessels dropped to the low record figure of 8.7. Under the operation of the Underwood tariff law the percentage of our imports and exports carried in American vessels jumped to 16.3 in 1916, the year before we entered the war, and rapidly increased thereafter in the manner before explained, until the enactment of the Fordney emergency tariff bill, after which our imports and exports, as well as the percentage carried in American vessels, rapidly declined. It is also a noteworthy fact that while our shipping was gradually but surely slipping away from us under the destructive operation of an increasingly high protective tariff our shipping was being taken over chiefly by free-trade England, whose world business and merchant fleet were increasing by leaps and bounds.

I do not wish to be understood as contending that high protective tariff duties were the sole cause of the decline in American shipping, but, as Mr. Bates states, it certainly was "a most effective cause for the decline." It was undoubtedly the chief cause.

In spite of such a showing, it is the policy of the present administration to raise the tariff wall still higher and higher, those qualified to speak claiming that the pending tariff bill would increase tariff duties on an average of 50 per cent more than any preceding tariff legislation. Perhaps in the light of such a policy, Chairman Lasker and his high-paid experts, after nearly eight months' investigation and study of the problem, assert that the only solution of our merchant-marine problem is a ship subsidy, and Chairman Lasker states that President Harding will soon make such a recommendation to Congress.

I have shown the situation of the American merchant marine at the time we became involved in the World War. The situation then confronting us and the manner in which it was met are graphically described by Charles Piez, formerly head of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation and a prominent Republican, who in a letter to Hon. JOSEPH WALSH, chairman of the select congressional committee appointed to investigate Shipping Board operations, stated in part:

The task delegated by the President of the United States to the Fleet Corporation under authority granted him in the emergency shipping fund provision of the urgent deficiencies appropriation act was to build ships to meet the necessities of the Government during the war.

TASK WAS TO BUILD SHIPS FASTER THAN SUBMARINES COULD SINK THEM.

It was a war assignment, not a peace undertaking. We had to build ships faster than the submarine could sink them. That was our job, a job performed against heavy odds, under intense pressure.

SINKING BY SUBMARINES FAR OUTSTRIPPED WORLD CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS.

Submarine sinkings averaged 750,000 tons per month, English output 200,000 tons per month, and the output of American yards from July 1 to December 31, 1917, was but 49 vessels of 301,000 tons.

In other words, at the rate they were being sunk, it would be only a few months until the allied shipping would be sunk, because at that time there were only 43,000,000 tons of world shipping, and only a little over half of it belonged to the Allies. Mr. Piez continues:

In the first six months of 1918 our production rose to 169 vessels of 1,086,000 tons, and in the two months before the armistice we delivered 148 ships of 769,000 tons, or at the rate of 4,600,000 tons per year, eight times the output of the preceding year. And we had to create our own yards and facilities to do it.

The Fleet Corporation delivered 479 vessels of over 2,750,000 tons before the armistice, and had in the wet basins and on the ways in various stages of completion over five and one-half million tons of shipping on Armistice Day. The corporation can not be charged with lack of accomplishment.

The war was costing us thousands of precious lives and $50,000,000 per day. It was a time when ship output alone counted, and when refinements of accounting details and record keeping had to be subordinated to the main purpose.

Now, the primary purpose, as is admitted, of this vast ship construction was as a war emergency measure. In other words, it was for the transportation of our troops and supplies. According to the testimony of Mr. Love, one of Chairman Lasker's experts, at the hearings on this bill:

We transported overseas 2,104,230 of our troops, of which 951,803 were transported across in American bottoms, and of the 2,057,269 brought home, 1,765,379 were brought home in American vessels.

Of course, in addition to our troops, a tremendous amount of supplies for our troops and the Allies were transported overseas, and likewise a large amount of equipment and supplies were brought back in our ships—

Our construction outdistanced the German submarine destruction. Consequently the primary purpose was attained; that is, of meeting the military situation with which we were confronted.

As a result of this enormous ship construction, intended primarily to meet a very serious war emergency, we now find ourselves in possession of a very large merchant fleet. After deducting vessels which have been sold, according to the testimony of Chairman Lasker, we now have 1,724 ships, of 11,287,125 deadweight tons. Deducting 264 wood and composite vessels, 10 concrete vessels, and 2 ex-German sailors, leaves us 1,448 steel vessels of 10,248,394 deadweight tons. The net amount of money that has been available for the Shipping Board under appropriations and allotments since its inception to July 1, 1921, is $3,306,310,576.98. The cost of our fleet on July 1, 1921, was $2,409,563,669.53.

This, of course, does not include the American privately owned tonnage, the seagoing tonnage of which amounts to about 2,300,000 tons additional.

While immediately preceding the World War the American seagoing tonnage constituted a small percentage of the world tonnage, yet we now have more than one-fourth of the world tonnage. We have three-fourths as much tonnage as Great Britain, and a greater tonnage than the combined tonnage of the five nations possessing the largest tonnage next to Great Britain and the United States, to wit, Japan, France, Italy, Norway, and Holland.

In his 1921 report the Commissioner of Navigation describes the growth of the American merchant marine in the following language:

In 1907 the United States had less than 10 per cent of the world's steel tonnage; in 1914 we had still less than 10 per cent, while at present, through our vast war expenditures, we have 26 per cent of the world's steel tonnage and 27 per cent of the world's total tonnage. In a word, the tonnage under the American flag is adequate to conduct not only 50 per cent of our commerce, as it did last year, but over 75 per cent of the foreign commerce of the United States and the coasting trade.

There has been interminable criticism of the former Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation with respect to this enormous ship construction program and also with regard to the operation of the fleet subsequent to the war. Such criticism has been freely and recklessly indulged in in this debate. It has been freely indulged in by Chairman Lasker ever since he was appointed chairman of the Shipping Board, both in the hearings and in the public press. Nobody familiar with the facts will deny that there were mistakes and that there was necessarily great waste, but it is only fair to take into consideration the conditions under which they were operating. I have already quoted from Mr. Charles Piez, a very prominent Republican, who was president of the Emergency Fleet Corporation during a large period of the construction program and who, according to press reports, was offered the chairmanship of the present Shipping Board by President Harding. By reason of the persistent criticisms of the same character as those repeated in this debate and repeated ad nauseum by Chairman Lasker, I wish to again call attention to the fact that a resolution was passed through the last House providing for the appointment of a select committee on Shipping Board operations, which committee was appointed by Speaker GILLETT and consisted of four Republicans and two Democrats, of which the able gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was made chairman. At great expense this committee conducted extensive investigations, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific. After the most thorough investigations that committee made a unanimous report to this House last March. Among other things this report in its conclusions (pp. 24–25) states:

It must be remembered that the Shipping Board in dealing with the war emergency was confronted with many difficulties. The program of construction, as well as operation, was gigantic. It involved an expenditure of more than three and a half billion dollars, a sum greater than any expended by any corporation in a similar period of time. Many of the officials and board members were without experience in either shipbuilding or operation. No adequate organization existed at the beginning. A complete organization to carry out its large program had to be created. There was a shortage of shipbuilding skill as well as shipbuilding facilities. The need for ships was imperative and constantly increased during the combat period.

Of necessity, under these conditions and when time was of the very essence of the problem, waste and extravagance resulted. However, the committee has found no evidence to prove that dishonest or fraudulent motives actuated any members of the Shipping Board or any member of the board of trustees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

There has been waste and inefficiency and lack of coordination in the tremendous operations of this Government agency. The reason or justification given for this is the stress under the war emergency. No one will deny that there was a great emergency; that time was the most vital factor.

Considering the program as a whole, the accomplishments in the number of ships constructed, the tonnage secured, and the time within which the ships were completed and delivered constitute the most remarkable achievement in shipbuilding that the world has ever seen.

However, that investigation and report has not deterred the "muck rakers" in the least.

In spite of his persistent criticism and efforts to excuse his own inability and failure, even Chairman Lasker at the hearings on this bill was bound to recognize the prodigious problem confronting the former Shipping Board and the difficulties under whch it labored in the following language:

There was a time during the progress of the Great War when the Central Powers threatened strangulation of the world's oceanic lines of trade. Sinkings of cargo boats by enemy submarines, both in the Atlantic and in the Mediterranean, were of almost daily occurrence. To repair this damage and to keep open channels of transportation for foodstuffs, men, and military supplies the imperative need of the Allies was for ships, more ships, and again more ships.

To meet this great need the Shipping Board undertook the largest and most intensive shipbuilding program in the history of the world. The producing capacity of all shipyards was contracted for and additional shipbuilding facilities were planned and erected on an enormous scale. An unprecedented number of steel ships was ordered to be built, and when it appeared impossible to produce steel vessels in sufficient time to avert disaster to the cause of the Allies, contracts were let also for the construction of wood ships, and experiments were ventured in concrete construction. The construction program was in full sway, and the industries of the country were pouring their output into the seaport cities for fabrication and assembly into ships when the armistice came.

Following the armistice, the Shipping Board had on its hands vast quantities of materials and equipment located in numerous cities throughout the United States, which had been intended for ship construction. Its principal function was now liquidation rather than construction.

Besides, whatever mistakes were made were largely Republican mistakes, because those enormous contracts and expenditures were largely made by or under the supervision of prominent Republicans, such as Gen. George W. Goethals, Charles M. Schwab, and Charles Piez, who at different times were at the head of the work, and of J. H. Rossiter, Director of Operations, and including the three marvelous and highly paid experts who are now at the helm. Of course, President Wilson could not give his personal attention to the problem of quickly constructing ships to meet the war emergency. He called into the work men who had national reputations as ship-construction experts, financiers, and organizers. Displaying that broad, nonpartisan spirit which he manifested in all matters pertaining to the war emergency, it happened that he called into this Shipping Board work more Republicans than he did Democrats. If the Democratic administration made mistakes, it was in the appointment of Republicans, and as to that Republicans are estopped from complaining.

Now, after they had entered upon that shipbuilding program what was the result in the amount of tonnage that was carried in American vessels? Remember that in the year before the war it had been reduced to 8.7 per cent of our American exports and imports. In 1920 we carried 42.7 per cent of American imports and exports in our own vessels.

A good deal has been said about the character of the ships that were constructed. Ever since he was appointed Mr. Lasker himself has been denouncing and decrying the very property which he has been delegated to sell for the Government. He has made his reputation and his money in the advertising business, but I dare say he did not succeed by decrying and denouncing the articles that he was advertising to be sold. But he has pursued that course from the very beginning with respect to our Shipping Board vessels.

I am going to quote another very prominent Republican, a gentleman who is familiar with the subject, a gentleman who would not only have no interest in boosting the ships but who, if acting in his personal interest, would be interested in denouncing them.

I refer to James A. Farrell, who is president of the United States Steel Corporation, and whose company is in the ship construction and ship operating business, and which will furnish most of the steel for future ship construction. Certainly he has no interest, as I said, in boosting this enormous steel tonnage which we now own, that comes in competition with ships that otherwise his shipyards could construct. What does he say about it? In an address that he delivered at Cleveland, Ohio, last May, referring to our Shipping Board vessels, he said:

The steel ships were well constructed and, with few exceptions, compare favorably with the work of the best builders in any country. While we may only surmise what will ultimately become of the wooden ships which were built as a result of the dictates of military necessity, and in response to the appeal from our associates for ships, and more ships, the fact remains that our steel ships are fine examples of the skill of American mechanics.

He says this is true with only a few exceptions. Mr. Lasker now says about half of them are first class.

Furthermore, about the cost of them you have heard a great deal said. What does Mr. Farrell say about that?

The claim is made, and justly, that the cost of American ships must reasonably approximate the costs of their competitors, and that capital charges must be substantially equalized with those of our competitors. The fact remains that while a considerable number of ships built abroad have been sold under stress of necessity at less than half the cost of reproduction, as in the case of ex-enemy ships sold by Great Britain, the great bulk of the world's tonnage built during the war fairly approximates the average cost of our own fleet.

That in spite of the supposed difference in wages and other costs of construction. I am calling as witnesses on these propositions members of the very party from which these criticisms come.

They talk a good deal about the reduction of expenditures and about the reforms that are being wrought. In that connection, and in regard to what was done and what was not done by the old Shipping Board, I want again to call attention to the fact that we were without any confirmed Shipping Board from June, 1920, until March 4, 1921, and from March 4 until the following June we had absolutely no Shipping Board whatever. That was certainly not the fault of the minority. We did not refuse to confirm the board appointed by President Wilson, and we did not wait four months after March 4, 1921, to appoint a new board. Under those conditions, with the Shipping Board without a head, absolutely rudderless, what else could we expect? And it was during this period, when we had no Shipping Board, that most of the loss of operations and other expenses occurred that they now criticize.

In explaining the difficulties confronting him, Chairman Lasker declared at the hearings on this bill:

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, while the members of the Shipping Board feel that we have made vast and unbelievable progress in the reorganization of the board and Fleet Corporation as we have now set them up, I can not too strongly emphasize that we want nothing that we say or represent to be interpreted as remotely insinuating on our part that mistakes and errors are not being constantly made under our administration. In an enterprise so vast, and one that, coming out of the womb of the war, as a war measure, had to be changed into a peace-time operation, it will require a long period of patient, able, and unstinted administrative effort to bring about normal conditions and normal procedure such as exist in old-established organizations.

However, Chairman Lasker and the present board did not take charge until nearly three years after the armistice. How much greater must have been the difficulties during and immediately after the war? Yet what was the record of operations of the old Shipping Board prior to the enactment of the merchant marine act of 1920, which required the appointment and confirmation of a new Shipping Board, as compared to the record made since the present board took charge? In the report on the merchant marine bill, submitted to the Senate by Chairman JONES of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, it is shown that the net profit derived from the operation of Shipping Board vessels, from the beginning of such operations to March 31, 1920, was $132,783,781.29. The merchant marine act, which required the appointment and confirmation of a new Shipping Board, became a law June 5, 1920.

The bill under consideration carries an appropriation of $50,000,000 to cover losses for the year ending June 30, 1923. What a vast improvement is being made under the present management!

As I say, they talk about saving. Let us see how much we are saving. This bill that we are considering carries an appropriation of $26,500,000 more than the 1922 appropriation, and in addition it provides for the use of an unexpended balance, and also carries an authorization to spend $55,000,000 out of sales. Three years after the war they are increasing the expenditures of this board.

Another thing in that connection: Although the amount of this year's appropriation is $26,500,000 more than last year, yet last year's appropriations included $25,000,000 for construction, and this bill does not carry a dollar for construction, because the construction program is practically completed. In other words, with the construction ended and various other activities ended, they are increasing the appropriations and they are also increasing the personnel, as has been fully shown by others.

They have been increasing salaries until 67 officials in the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation are receiving larger salaries than Senators, Congressmen, and United States district judges, and 29 additional are receiving salaries equal to those received by said officials. I want to know if that is not retrenchment and economy with a vengeance? They ought to be saving. Why do I say that? On January 1, 1921, we were operating 836 Shipping Board vessels, and I believe Mr. Lasker claims that when he took charge 674 were then being operated. They have laid up ships until we now have only 390 all told in operation, and he said in the hearings that he naturally laid off the ones that were losing the most and retained the ones with the best prospects. In other words, although they have reduced the ships in operation by more than half, yet they are still increasing the appropriations. They can make all the distinctions and refinements that they want to, but the fact remains and their own report shows that this bill carries $26,500,000 more than last year's appropriation, in addition to the unexpended balance and the authorization to use $55,000,000 from sales, and also they are relieved of the obligation to the Navy. As I say, this bill does not carry anything for construction, which all the previous bills carried, even last year's bill carrying $25,000,000 for that purpose; and I am not going to criticize them for laying off the ships that they have laid off.

I think perhaps they are pursuing the right policy in that respect. However, I do say this, and no man can deny it, that they ought to reduce costs very materially. But how has it resulted? It has not resulted in any saving in appropriations, but it has done this. I want you to listen to this:

The Department of Commerce recently made the rather depressing announcement that American ships are carrying a decreasing percentage of our export and import trade, the Shipping Board vessels making the worse showing.

I have here the exact figures, set out month by month, showing that which is stated in substance in the preceding sentences, and which is more specifically summarized in a recent article in the Annalist, as follows:

Foreign ships are rapidly regaining control of our import trade. In July, 1920, they carried only 36 per cent of the total, while in July, 1921, they carried 54 per cent. During the same period American independent vessels increased their tonnage from 32 to 36 per cent, while the Shipping Board lost 22 per cent. The Shipping Board vessels handled only 86,788 tons of imports, 10 per cent of the total, in July, 1921, a record low figure, and only one-sixth of the total carried in July, 1920.

I myself asked Chairman Lasker what he had to say in respect to that situation—that is, that the Shipping Board vessels have very materially lost their proportionate percentage of business since he took charge, and the foreign vessels are carrying a larger percentage of our imports and exports and at the same time the private American vessels were increasing their percentage of our imports and exports carried. He very candidly replied that there was not enough business, he did not think, to make it profitable for both the private American vessels and the Shipping Board vessels, so they pulled off the Shipping Board vessels in order to give the business to the private vessels. It seems that they get some of it and the foreign vessels get a good deal of it. In other words—and that is the chief trouble about the whole situation and has been from the beginning—that those in charge of our Shipping Board affairs have never at any time regarded the American taxpayer; they are not regarding him now.

They are regarding the American taxpayer less than ever before; they are very much concerned about the private shipping interests, and so am I to a certain extent, but whenever there is a choice between the private shipping interests and the public interests they resolve it in favor of the private interests and boldly announce it as their policy. We can not get this thing properly solved as long as that situation obtains. The so-called experts, those controlling the affairs and operations of this board, are men taken from competitive interests, many of whom it is reported still retain their connection with private interests. Now, to whom do they owe allegiance? All we can judge of is from the way they act and by the way they talk.

Mr. WASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. For a question.

Mr. WASON. Can the gentleman suggest to us the name of some person connected with the Shipping Board now that has not severed his connection with private interests?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It has been stated repeatedly, and so far as I have seen never denied, that two of the experts come within that class.

Mr. WASON. What experts does the gentleman refer to?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I do not for the moment recall which ones, but there are three of them.

Mr. WASON. Will the gentleman look it up and put their names in his remarks?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; the experts are Messrs. Frey, Smull, and Love. I do not know which ones, but it was charged in debate before, and it has been stated in the press and never denied to my knowledge. It was asked last July in the hearings whether there was any requirement when these high-priced experts were employed that they should sever their private connections, and it was stated that there was no requirement or agreement to that effect.

Mr. WASON. I asked that very question of these three gentlemen and they denied any interest in private concerns; said they had severed them before they came into their present position.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If that is the fact, I am glad to know it and stand corrected. This is the first time that it has ever been denied to my knowledge. It has been stated in the press at different times and on the floor that the contrary was true. Be that as it may, the fact remains that according to reliable and undenied newspaper reports these three experts were selected for Chairman Lasker by the American Steamship Owners' Association and the United States Ship Operators' Association and that Chairman Lasker is reported to have publicly announced that he will be guided by the advice of the officials of the above-named associations. Furthermore, all that has been said and done by the present administration indicates a deep and abiding concern for private shipping interests rather than the interests of the Government and the taxpayers.

Now, I insist that whatever criticism may be directed against the old board which operated under war conditions and conditions subsisting immediately after the war, thus far no improvement has been made either in the management of the Shipping Board or the operations of the vessels or as to the solution of the problem. Mr. Lasker throughout his testimony and likewise in the press tells us time and again that the only solution is a ship subsidy; that the only way we can sell the ships is to provide a subsidy; that even if we will sell the ships at a nominal price we must guarantee that they can operate at a profit by the Government making up the difference. Well, I suppose you could sell most anything on similar conditions, but it is better to give away our ships and lose every dollar we have got in them than to commit the Government to a permanent ship-subsidy proposition which would cost us many times what we would get for our ships.

Back in the golden era of American shipping it was not maintained by any ship subsidy. When we come to discuss that question, as I suppose we will sooner or later, I expect to have considerable to say about it. However, the point I am now making is that, after he has been chairman of the Shipping Board for six months, Chairman Lasker practically admits that he can not put our merchant marine on a successful basis, and the only alternative is for the Government to step in and pay the difference between the cost of operations and a profit. That is what the private shippers have been seeking for years, but Chairman Lasker is the first high Government official to boldly champion their cause since the days of Mark Hanna.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Now, why do I say that there has been no reform? Reference has already been made to the fact that they even have not changed the character of the operating contracts, which were so severely condemned by Chairman Lasker and other Republicans.

Here is what Chairman Lasker said in the hearings last July about those M. O. 4 contracts:

> The contract is the most shameful piece of chicane, inefficiency, and of looting the Public Treasury that the human mind can devise.

That is what Mr. Lasker said six months ago, and then on August 19 last he gave out a statement that was carried on that day by the Associated Press in the following article:

> "BARE BOAT" PLAN ADOPTED BY LASKER—MAKES BENSON'S SYSTEM NEW POLICY OF SHIPPING BOARD TO SAVE NATION'S MONEY—GOVERNMENT WAS A LOSER—UNDER OPERATORS' AGREEMENT PROFIT WAS MADE AT NO TIME EXCEPT WHEN RATES WERE HIGH.
> [By the Associated Press.]
> Decision to substitute a "bare boat" charter for the system under which practically all Shipping Board vessels are now operated was announced last night by Chairman Lasker after a conference with President Harding. Instead of the boats being turned over to operators on a 5 per cent commission basis, it is the board's intention to adopt a uniform charter, under which the vessels will be leased on a tonnage basis, the lessee assuming the same risks of profit or loss as he would under the routine commercial charter.
> INAUGURATED BY BENSON.
> Under the charter now employed, known as the managing operator's agreement, Mr. Lasker explained, both the Government and the operator profited when traffic was plentiful and rates high, but only the Government lost when there was a surplus of tonnage, causing a decline in rates below the point where they would meet operating expenses.
> Admiral Benson, shortly before he resigned from the chairmanship, inaugurated the "bare boat" charter in a few cases with a view, he then announced, of enabling the new board to determine whether it was desirable to substitute this as a policy for the operating agreement.
> The Shipping Board has ordered a survey made as a basis for working out details of the new rental plan.
> Those having charge of the work were instructed to submit their report within 30 days, but it was emphasized by Mr. Lasker yesterday that no general cancellation of existing charters would be made. Rather, he said, the board would attempt to put the change into effect gradually, in order that the least injury possible would be done to the interests of operators.

Please note in the concluding sentence of said article Chairman Lasker's characteristically deep solicitude for the private operators, even though they were operating under contracts which Chairman Lasker had publicly denounced as "the most shameful piece of chicane, inefficiency, and of looting the Public Treasury that the human mind can devise," and contracts which Chairman Lasker had a legal right to terminate any day he saw proper, according to his own admission. This is simply one of innumerable evidences of his expressed indifference to the public interests.

It was last August that this great advertiser advertised to the world that they were going to reform this iniquitous situation as to operating contracts, but after he and his experts have been in office for more than six months, in the recent hearings he and Mr. Smull admit that they have not changed those contracts one particle—no; have not changed a single contract. They have discontinued a lot, but they have not changed a single contract. They are still operating 327 ships under the M. O. 4 contracts. They have gotten rid of all of the little fellows and have left the business in the hands of a few operators, but they have not changed this contract which Chairman Lasker described in the language which I have quoted.

What other great reforms have we had? There was much criticism of the old board because of its expenditures for advertising. In the heyday of the old Shipping Board, when they were operating 836 ships, the highest amount they ever expended for advertising was $936,000 in one year. How much reform has there been by the present board? The present bill carries over $1,450,000 for advertising, although they are operating less than half as many ships. Operating less than half as many ships, they have increased the advertising bill from $936,000 to $1,450,000. That is another one of their great reforms.

I wish I had time to discuss this claims proposition. The bill carries $50,000,000 for the payment of claims, and if I had time I believe I could convince you from the record and the hearings that they do not propose to make those settlements upon any legal or even business basis. They did away with the legal boards that were to determine those matters, and now they have set up a commission only one of whom is a lawyer, two of whom are shipbuilders, and so forth. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. LAZARO].

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I now yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND].

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if Mr. GALLIVAN and the other Members of the Massachusetts delegation have been unable to obtain the Leviathan contract for the Boston Navy Yard, I am satisfied that no one else need try to accomplish that result. Those men are diligent, zealous, and faithful at all times in the representation of their constituents. They have done everything possible. I can not, however, agree with the criticism which Mr. GALLIVAN has made of the distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby. Mr. Denby's letter shows that he is considering the best interests of his country. The gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that by this time the contract shall have been awarded to the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. for the reconditioning of the Leviathan. That plant is in my district, and I sincerely trust that the gentleman from Massachusetts is correct. There are no stronger reasons that could be offered for this action of the Shipping Board nor for the refusal of the Secretary to approve an award to the Boston Navy Yard, than are contained in the very able letter of the Secretary of the Navy. He says:

> A bid by a private firm is a guaranty of the performance of the work at a price named and within a time stipulated.

What do the hearings show? That there must be a bid on which you can pin your faith when the work is finished. The testimony of Mr. J. W. Powell, president of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, shows that in reconditioning work of this kind until the work shall have opened up, it is absolutely impossible to tell to what result the work will lead or how much extra work will have to be done in order to complete the contract. Mr. Powell said:

> From the character of this work there must be very considerable risk in connection with its performance. In spite of all the care that has been taken in drawing up these specifications, as the work opens up, there will be things developed that the man who stood on the outside and made the estimate could not see. When this happens to a private concern it has taken that risk, and will have to pay for doing the work. When it happened at a navy yard, the navy yard would spend the money necessary and we would pay whatever it cost. My best judgment is that because of the fact that the navy yards are not used to doing this character of work, and because of the vastness of this particular undertaking, the navy yard could very easily underestimate the cost by as much as $2,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, an estimate on the part of the navy yard is an estimate pure and simple.

If the estimate falls short, then the Government must provide the money in some subsequent appropriation. If, however, a private contractor, as in this case, fails to perform his work, he must pay for it. His bond must make it good. If extra work develops, he must perform it. Mr. Powell says that the Newport News yard is as good as the Bank of England or the Treasury Department of the United States. He is right. Just in this connection let me say that the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. has never asked me to help to secure this contract for them. I have been told and I believe that they will lose money, but they are making the bid to help their men and as a simple business means of keeping together a perfect organization, which has been established through a number of years. In the transition period which disarmament brings upon us and while work upon a navy has ceased they wish to hold this organization and to provide work for men who have been with them in busier days. They hope to keep this plant together. They have faith in the future. They believe, as I do, that in Hampton Roads we have a potential port, unexcelled on the Atlantic coast, and that the time will come when its proper proportion of foreign commerce will make it equal to New York itself, and probably its superior. They know that their geographical location will enable them then to take advantage of that situation.

Mr. Lasker, chairman of the United States Shipping Board, says that any contract which this shipbuilding concern makes will be as good as any commitment that the Government makes.

Returning to Mr. Denby's reasons for refusing the request of the navy yard, he says:

> A bid by a navy yard is the estimated cost of the work. If work is awarded a navy yard after an estimate, the actual cost of the work is charged, whether same be greater than or less than the estimated cost. Estimates ordinarily run fairly close, say within about 10 per cent; but in a big reconditioning job where the actual amount of work necessary can only be revealed after opening up work and uncovering all defects, it is difficult to make an estimate that will fall within 10 per cent of the actual cost.
> Furthermore, the stipulated time for the performance of work for other departments of the Government must always be subject to the condition that urgent naval work shall take precedence, even if such precedence causes failure to perform the other Government departments' work within the time stipulated.
> As the total cost of reconditioning the Leviathan will probably run somewhere between $6,000,000 and $8,000,000, it will be seen that an estimate submitted by a navy yard would not give the Shipping Board the exact information which they desire as to cost and time of performance of this work. The necessity for economy is so great that the authorities of the Shipping Board do not feel that they could take the chance of overrunning the estimated cost by possibly $500,000 or $600,000. They must have a guaranteed total expenditure.
> In addition to the above uncertainties which surround the submission of estimates by a navy yard and their acceptance by the Shipping Board, the department finds that at the present time the status of work at navy yards is such that it would not be advantageous to undertake the reconditioning of the Leviathan at a navy yard.

The difficulty of estimating with accuracy is shown by the fact that between the bids of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. for the reconditioning of this work and the next higher bid there was a margin, I understand, of about $1,000,000. This difficulty, as well as the difficulty of performing work of this character on a mere estimate, will appear when it is known that between the maximum and the minimum bids for the materials and supplies required for this work there was a margin of $2,000,000. Time is another important factor. Mr. Powell, representing the Shipping Board, says that it is essential that they shall have this ship in service in time to go on her run in March, 1923, and that the contract with a private contractor will provide heavy penalties for delay. I am informed that the penalty will amount to $1,000 a day for delay in delivery beyond the stipulated time. On the other hand, Mr. Denby says that it is impossible to estimate when the work could be finished in the navy yards, because other Government work would have precedence.

He says that if a battleship should be disabled it must be given priority. As a result, when this ship might be most valuable in the transatlantic service, she might still remain in the yard. If the work is done in a navy yard there will be no damages recoverable; if the work is done by the private company, I understand there will be a demurrage of $1,000 a day. Mr. Powell says:

> If she was delayed so that she missed the months of April and May we would lose an enormous amount of revenue. That is our spring season. You have got to know in advance to make your arrangements for your passengers, and we might very well lose by that ship being a few months late in delivery perhaps $2,000,000 in revenue.

As to the necessity of reconditioning the Leviathan I have no question. The evidence is that she is costing $44,000 a month in cash at a dock, which might itself bring in $18,000, or an entire cost to the Government of $62,000 per month.

The hearings show that the transatlantic passenger liners are the only liners that are being operated by the Shipping Board satisfactorily. They have been run practically full all the time. As far as can be foreseen this condition is going to continue. The hearings show that based on filling, on the average, one-third of her total passenger-carrying capacity there would be earned an annual net profit of $800,000. Of course, these results are problematical, but that is true of every business venture. The only conclusion that can be reached at the present for future guidance is that based upon the experience of the past. If at the present time these large passenger liners are being operated at a profit it is reasonable to suppose that a vessel of this type will be operated at a profit in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Victory Memorial.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE].

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as this debate proceeds it certainly develops one very prominent fact: That a great and growing evil exists in this Government which should be corrected. This evil has existed for a great many years and, since I have been a Member of this House, it has been continually growing worse. It lies in the method pursued by the heads of departments in seeking appropriations from Congress. The Congress awards those appropriations under certain conditions, but as soon as the appropriations are made available the heads of the departments proceed to spend the money as they please, and then come back to Congress without even any defense for the manner in which the money has been expended. During the debates they send their representatives here, who sit in the galleries and smile at the Members of Congress who are honestly trying to save money for the Government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I intend to discuss this bill only in one particular feature, namely the repair of the ships which are controlled by the Shipping Board. Concerning this there has been a great deal of justifiable criticism. Two years ago on this floor I presented a resolution asking for an investigation as to the manner in which the Leviathan was to be reconditioned. I told this House that a combination existed, and that no concerns except those that were within the favor of the International Mercantile Marine would be permitted to bid upon repairs on that ship. The Speaker appointed a committee on investigation headed by my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and that committee went to New York, and conducted an investigation, with the result that every charge that we made was verified. And the board refused to recondition the ship under the conditions named.

Now, the Shipping Board is here asking for money to recondition this ship again, and the criticism has been made by the Members of this House that citizens of this country, skilled workmen of many years' experience, are not to be permitted to work upon these ships, but that men who are not citizens of the country, employed by private shipyards, who during the war held up this country for fabulous pay, are going to be permitted to do this work. We have no criticism, I say it to my colleagues, of any shipyard that is bidding upon this work. All we ask is that workmen in the United States navy yards be given an opportunity to present estimates for doing work upon Government ships, under the same conditions as are permitted to private shipyards.

Before these bids were made or were asked for, I called upon the head of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, Mr. Powell, and requested that the navy yards be given permission to put in estimates on this work, and Mr. Powell told me that he could not permit it. I then called upon the Assistant Secretary of the Navy and appealed in the name of the workmen of the navy yards, who are being put out of employment, with the navy yard lying idle at tremendous expense to the Government, to allow these estimates to be made. He held that the law would not permit the Navy Department to make a bid, nor would the Shipping Board accept an estimate.

Thereupon the mayor of the city of Boston came here, and with him and my colleagues from Massachusetts, I called upon the head of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, but we were not even allowed the courtesy of meeting him to discuss this question. He was too busy to see us. But the mayor of Boston was not too busy to travel 500 miles in order to assist in securing work for men who were walking the streets of Boston.

I wrote to the President of the United States on the 4th of January, but received no reply. I wrote him another letter on the 9th day of January, and on the 11th he replied that he had taken this matter up with others and had already come to the conclusion that this work should not be done by the navy yard.

Now, what are the facts? Two years ago Admiral Benson, then head of the Shipping Board, upon my suggestion asked the navy yards of this country to put in estimates on this work. I had claimed there was a combination among shipbuilders to the effect that one concern would get this ship, and when the bids were opened that concern alone had bid about $10,000,000 for this work. The estimates of the Charlestown Navy Yard were $8,000,000, accompanied by a guaranty. To-day the bids are reopened, and the hearings will show what concerns offered them. They had been divided among several private concerns, and the lowest bid for reconditioning that ship to-day is but little more than $8,000,000, or practically the same amount of money that was asked for by the navy yard at Boston when work was being done at war-time prices. We have guaranteed to the Shipping Board that this work will be done by the Boston Navy Yard at a cost to the Government of $1,000,000 less than it can be done by private shipyards. Moreover, the men of the navy yard at Boston stand ready to give the Government any guaranty it wishes. The chamber of commerce has offered to put up any substantial guaranty that the Shipping Board may desire. The mayor of Boston and the mayor elect of Boston have been here and have presented similar guaranties. What more does the Shipping Board want. Here is a saving of $1,000,000. Must it be waived aside to satisfy the private shipbuilders of this country, who in the hearings held in New York by the special committee testified that there is not a harbor on the Atlantic coast that had a dock large enough to receive this ship?

This vessel draws 37 feet of water. She weighs 52,000 tons. We say to the Shipping Board that we will take her right up to the navy yard, not to the dry dock alone, but right up into the navy-yard docks, and condition her there; and when this is done we will, within 10 minutes, take her right into the great dry dock owned by the United States Government and there complete the entire work upon her.

Mr. Chairman, the bids put in are $8,200,000. The record of the hearing shows, under the testimony of Mr. Powell, that they are going to pay $627,000 for taking the ship from the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. to the Boston Dry Dock for completion. It shows, too, that they are going to pay out $650,000 for watchmen, an expense which is absolutely unnecessary, because the navy yard maintains a watchmen's crew at the navy yard at all times. It shows further that there will be an expenditure of $225,000 for inspection. If the work were done by the Government, this inspection cost would be eliminated, as an inspection crew is always maintained at the Boston Navy Yard. Let me add further that the Government will be obliged to give to the private shipbuilding interests the use of her dock if the work is to be performed by private enterprise.

One man, Mr. Ferguson, who testified at the hearing was a gentleman connected with the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. A year or two ago he testified that there was only one dock on the Atlantic coast that could take this ship, and that was at Boston. It is a rather significant thing that this same Mr. Ferguson, now a member of the United States Shipping Board claims department, who testified that the ship would have to be brought to Boston to be reconditioned, is now endeavoring to have the work done by the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., notwithstanding his testimony that Boston was the only place equipped for the work.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this talk in the Shipping Board of no guaranty of the work being given by the Boston Navy Yard is all tommyrot and bosh. During the war and since the Navy Department in all its yards has done work for the Shipping Board, and on every occasion but one—and that was the fault of the Shipping Board—it has not only completed the work within the estimates but has saved the Government millions of dollars and, moreover, performed better work. Though millions have thus been saved—and the Shipping Board know it—they come, nevertheless, before the Committee on Appropriations and say they can not really depend upon the men in the navy yards to do this work, because they have never been accustomed to work of this character. It is ridiculous and nonsensical for intelligent men to say to the people of this country that men who have been shipbuilders all their lives can not recondition this ship.

Mr. Chairman, since the day this ship was taken into the custody of the United States Government it has been practically in the control of a British-controlled shipping concern—the International Mercantile Marine—which is now receiving from the United States Shipping Board $15,000 for nothing more than the supervision of this ship while she is tied to the dock doing nothing. This is simply a gift coming out of the United States Treasury. While engaged in this gratuitous performance I ask you, What are you going to do with the idle workmen of the navy yard who are walking the streets of Boston to-day? What is going to become of the navy yard, that great Government institution in which millions of dollars are invested? I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that where there is an institution maintained by the people's money and equipped to perform the Government work, that work should be done in that institution.

Mr. Chairman, let this ship be reconditioned at Boston and we will guarantee to save the Government at least $1,000,000 on the bids, and, in addition, we can save $1,452,000 in the transportation of this ship to the dry dock from Newport News, together with the watchmen and inspection fees, and the other incidental expenses. Is not this amount worth saving? If not, Mr. Chairman, then all this talk of Congress during this session in behalf of economy is vain and idle, and, furthermore, the time of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and his colleagues, working as they do to save a million dollars here and a million there, has been in a large measure wasted if this amendment to save $1,000,000, if not $2,500,000 of the people's money, is rejected. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to read, for the information of the House, an amendment which I propose to offer to this bill on page 28, line 25, namely, after the word "available" insert the following new paragraph:

No part of any sum appropriated by this act or now available shall be used for the purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing unless it can be so purchased, acquired, repaired, or reconditioned for a sum less than such purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning can be made or done in a Government-owned establishment.

It is an amendment that I fail to see how any Member of this House who has at heart the interest of the taxpayers and the people can refuse to vote for. It simply provides that the existing facilities of the Government already provided and paid for by the taxpayers of the country shall be used, provided any of these things can be done absolutely cheaper in these Government-owned establishments than they can be done by private concerns.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. DALLINGER. I am very sorry that I have not the time. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have a man connected with our Government at the present time, a most interesting character and a man of great ability, who has been doing a great work. I refer to Gen. Dawes, chief of the Bureau of the Budget. Since he has occupied that position he has found evidences everywhere of enormous waste of the public money; department after department advertising for new bids for supplies of various kinds at high prices when some other department of the Government has quantities of those same supplies on hand that no one apparently knew that the Government possessed.

Mr. Chairman, we have in this country navy yards and arsenals thoroughly equipped with machinery and supplies of all kinds in which the people of the United States have invested vast sums of money—probably hundreds of millions of dollars. The upkeep and carrying on of these arsenals and navy yards is now being paid for out of the regular appropriations of this Government. We have in Boston, as has been referred to already, the only dry dock that is large enough to dock a vessel of the size of the Leviathan. It was originally constructed by the State of Massachusetts at great expense for the purpose of docking some of these great German steamers. It was purchased by the Federal Government and now belongs to that Government. We also have a thoroughly equipped navy yard at Boston in the immediate vicinity of this great dock, and I submit that as long as that navy yard is maintained and all the upkeep and the overhead charges are paid for out of the regular naval appropriation, and practically all the material necessary for the reconditioning of the Leviathan and of these other ships is already in the possession either of the Navy Department or the Shipping Board, the Leviathan or any other vessel of similar size can be reconditioned at Boston to-day for 65 per cent of what any private corporation can afford to attempt to do the work for, for the simple reason that a very large part of the expense is already being paid for by the taxpayers of this country, and the only additional expense to the Government would be the additional labor that would have to be employed. All the expert mechanics, machinists, and supervisors of construction are already there. They have to be kept on the pay roll if the Boston Navy Yard is going to function at all, and I venture to say that if an amendment of this kind is put upon this bill—which I want to inform the Members of the House is almost identical with an amendment that we placed upon the Army reorganization bill and which now applies to the arsenals of this country—you can save upon this vessel alone $2,000,000 of the people's money. If this amendment, which is in order under the Holman rule, is adopted, the next step will be for Gen. Dawes to do what he did in the case of the arsenals, viz, issue an executive order requiring that the navy yards be allowed to bid upon all work contemplated by any department of the Federal Government.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. I am very sorry I have not the time. Then if you could have an independent investigation by the Bureau of the Budget of just what the Government could save by having the Leviathan or any other Government vessel reconditioned at Boston or at any other Government navy yard, you would accomplish a great saving of expense to the Treasury of the United States. Now, the facts are, Mr. Chairman, that the Navy Department does not care for this work. The reason is easy to understand. When these naval officers who have the supervision of such work at navy yards are assigned to shore duty it is looked upon as more or less of a vacation. They naturally do not desire to have any work put upon them that they can avoid, particularly if that work is not strictly naval work. If the Leviathan comes to the Boston Navy Yard, they will be obliged to do a great deal more work than they are doing now. Their salaries go on just the same whether anything is done at the Boston Navy Yard or not, and the Navy does not want to be bothered with this work for another department. Such an attitude is perfectly natural and easily understood. On the other hand, the Shipping Board have shown time and time again that they prefer to have their work done in private shipyards. Neither of these agencies consider the matter from the broad standpoint of the possible saving to the Treasury of the United States. If, however, an amendment of this kind is adopted and an Executive order issued requiring all departments to allow the navy yards to submit estimates, and Gen. Dawes or some of his subordinates have the opportunity to investigate the matter and ascertain the proper kind of an estimate that should be made in order to save the Government money, I venture to say that you can save on the Leviathan alone at least $2,000,000 of the people's money. Moreover, if you fail to pass such an amendment as I have suggested, the reconditioning of the Mount Vernon and a lot of other boats that the Shipping Board have will be given out to private shipyards that are organized for profit, whose employees are largely aliens who were slackers during the war, and who, while our boys were fighting in the trenches for $33 a month, were getting $75 or $100 a week.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that when this matter comes up under the five-minute rule and this amendment is offered, the Members of the House will give this matter careful consideration and adopt this amendment which will result in a tremendous saving to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Government shipyards were refused the privilege of bidding on these ships?

Mr. DALLINGER. That is one of the mysteries. Formerly the navy yards were allowed to bid on Government work of this kind. The bid of the Boston Navy Yard before was $2,000,000 less than that of any private shipyard. At that time the private shipyards did not want to be bothered with this work. They were perfectly willing that it should go to the Boston Navy Yard. At that time none of the bids were accepted. Now, for some unknown reason the navy yards are not allowed to bid on this work.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman stated that the Boston Navy Yard was the only one capable of docking the Leviathan. Mr. Powell, on page 1165 of the hearings, says that the vessel would have to be docked either at the Norfolk Navy Yard or the Boston Navy Yard. Does the gentleman know whether the Norfolk Navy Yard is adequate or not?

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand it is practically admitted that the Boston dry dock is the only one that is large enough to take care of the Leviathan comfortably; and as my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE] pointed out, in the estimate of $8,000,000 for reconditioning the Leviathan one of the items is $650,000 for taking the Leviathan up to Boston to be docked.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines [Mr. GABALDON].

Mr. KIESS. And we yield him five minutes also.

The CHAIRMAN. The Resident Commissioner from the Philippines is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GABALDON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Congress, I deeply appreciate your courtesy in allowing me an opportunity at this time, when Philippine affairs are not before the House, to discuss a question that is of urgent and of the utmost importance to the people that I represent.

This courtesy on the part of the House is only in keeping with a multitude of others that have been shown me since I have been among you. The longer I am with you the more respect and affection I have for this body. You always aim to be fair, you are always courteous, and you are always willing and anxious to hear both sides of a question before you take action. I shall always remember my presence here as the most pleasurable experience of my life. No matter what your ultimate decision is relative to questions affecting my country, I shall never say, I can never justly say, that you did not give me every opportunity to be heard.

As you all know by now, I stand at all times for the immediate independence of my countrymen. I know you are too patriotic yourselves, and too broad minded, to believe that in aspiring to independence I am showing lack of appreciation of the honor of membership in this body. You would be doing me a great injustice to so believe. My observation of the conduct of this House, my sensing of the patriotism that ennobles and inspires you as you legislate for this great country, fills me with patriotism for my own land and makes me wish for the legislators of my country the same opportunities for patriotic service that you possess. In aspiring to independence it is not that we love America less but that our aspiration for independence is as dear to us as life itself.

I hold that human beings are entitled to all the self-respect they can possibly obtain from life, and that no intelligent and patriotic people can obtain the maximum of self-respect and happiness while being governed against their will by an alien race, no matter how benevolent the overlordship may possibly be. To get my feelings, gentlemen of the House, imagine a foreign flag to-day flying over this Capitol in which you sit. No matter how benevolent the policies it might stand for, would you be, could you be, happy?

I pray you not to do us the injustice of misunderstanding our motive in petitioning you for complete independence; we do not challenge the benevolence of your intentions, but are merely yearning for that freedom which is inherent to every self-respecting people.

NO BITTERNESS TOWARD AMERICA.

We want our independence, but we are not knocking at the doors of Congress with any bitterness in our hearts. We realize that a great service has been rendered us by the United States in assisting us to prepare ourselves for independence. If we must remain under the tutelage of some other nation, even against our will, we would prefer that country to be the United States. But we almost unanimously prefer our independence to being under even so great and altruistic a Nation as yours. This is not a slight to America; it is a compliment to both peoples, you and us. As soon as the United States soldiers became intrenched in the Philippine Islands schools were set up everywhere, and one of the textbooks used from the first day of American occupation was the history of the United States. How could it be expected that our young men could read the Declaration of Independence and study the history of this great country and not be inspired by the words of Washington, Jefferson, Patrick Henry, and Abraham Lincoln? We would be a people undeserving of the blessings of liberty if under America's teaching we did not aspire to emulate your example of government of the people, for the people, and by the people. To prove to us, as the United States has succeeded in doing, that independence is the greatest blessing of mankind, that it is the one thing that every patriotic citizen is justified in dying to obtain, and then to deny us that independence would surely be a cruel accomplishment.

WOOD-FORBES REPORT EVADES REAL ISSUE.

My special purpose in rising to-day is to discuss certain features of the report of the Wood-Forbes mission, which body was sent to the Philippines by President Harding to investigate and report on conditions there.

The recommendations made by the mission are unsatisfactory to my people. We can neither agree to them or accept them. We can reach no other conclusion than that the object of the investigators was to find excuses for delaying independence instead of to fulfill the promise of independence upon the establishment of a stable government contained in the Jones law of 1916.

We can only feel that in deciding upon our fitness for independence the members of the mission set an arbitrary qualification that no government on earth can now or ever will be able to meet. If we must wait until we are 100 per cent efficient, which is seemingly the standard the mission would require of us, our prospects are hopeless. I will later insert the editorial opinion of many American newspapers which fully uphold our contention that the mission has set a qualification for us that the United States itself does not approach. I will take up the various recommendations of the mission in detail later in my remarks.

My answer to the Wood-Forbes report is to demand anew, and with more emphasis than ever before, the immediate granting of independence to the 10,500,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. I insist that this is the only logical and righteous answer the Filipino people can make to this report, because it does not contain a single justifiable reason for America to longer postpone the keeping of its solemn pledge to us. The Jones law promised us independence upon one condition, the establishment of a stable government. "Stable government" was to be the one and only condition precedent. No other condition or attainment or virtue was to be required. I submit, therefore, that the Wood-Forbes report could have justified the further delaying of independence only by proving that we have not yet established the specified stable government. We to-day have such a stable government. The report absolutely failed to disprove this fact. As the mission could not successfully meet the real issue involved, it proceeded to ignore it.

The report is a clever but unworthy attempt to change the issue from that of stable government to a multitude of other conditions not required by Congress. If this can be done, then independence can be denied to Filipinos forever. But Congress never intended that independence should be denied us by such subterfuge.

What is a stable government? Does it imply a government 100 per cent efficient? Not at all. Furthermore, it implies nothing indefinite. In the dictionary of the American State Department "stable government" has just as definite a meaning as the words white or black. The United States for nearly a century and a half in all cases in which she has recognized the independence of a country or the establishment of a new government has held that the words "stable government" mean a government elected by the peaceful suffrages of the people, supported by the people, capable of maintaining order and of fulfilling its international obligations. Unquestionably we have a government that will meet this test. And having such a stable government, we ask for immediate and complete independence.

TO-DAY IS PROPITIOUS TIME TO GRANT INDEPENDENCE.

There are two additional and new developments in the Philippine situation which make the time opportune for action by the American Congress. One of these developments is the signing of the four-power treaty. If this treaty means what it is represented to mean, and there is not the slightest reason to believe otherwise, it means that the four great powers have joined to prevent further encroachments in the Pacific.

This means the elimination of the Japanese bugaboo as an important factor in the Philippine independence question. Many Americans have been assuring us for years that they would favor our independence were they not afraid that Japan would gobble us up. Even the Wood-Forbes report declared the United States would not be justified in "leaving the islands a prey to any powerful nation coveting their rich soil and potential commercial advantages."

The four-power treaty puts the quietus on this argument. For the United States to now take this attitude would be to belittle the efficacy of its own handiwork, the new treaty, and to show lack of confidence in its new allies. The treaty is an assurance that if the United States sets up a Philippine republic as the first Christian democracy in the Far East, it will be safe, inasmuch as the four greatest nations on earth will be guaranteeing its integrity.

But should there be the slightest apprehension on this score, it will now be a comparatively easy matter for the United States to induce its allies, Japan, Great Britain, and France, to sign a special Philippine republic neutrality agreement. There is every reason to believe these nations would sign such an agreement if asked to do so by the United States. No one of these nations could afford to refuse to sign and thus so early risk the world's unfavorable conclusions as to its good faith respecting the new treaty or its honorable intentions toward the Philippines.

The second important reason why right now is the propitious time for the United States to grant independence is this: The Nacionalista Party, the party overwhelmingly in the majority in the Philippines, has just recently adopted a platform in favor of independence without protection. One of the chief arguments has been that the Filipinos did not want real independence, but only independence with protection. It was argued by many large American newspapers that the United States could not think of granting Philippine independence with protection. The Wood-Forbes report declared "we find a general failure [among Filipinos] to appreciate the fact that independence under the protection of another nation is not true independence," and that the United States could not retain responsibility without authority.

The leaders of the Filipino people have never considered either of the two above arguments as being a bar to a solution of the Philippine problem. In the first place, Filipinos have no especial fear of Japan, because Philippine independence, in our opinion, is not inimical to Japan. The Japanese are now free to come to the Philippines, but there are less than 13,000 in the islands, even according to the Wood-Forbes report, and our own official figures reveal not many more than half this number.

Although Japan is almost at our door, there are only one-ninth as many Japanese in the entire Philippine Archipelago as in California alone, and California is far removed from Japan. The explanation of this is that the Japanese do not thrive in the Philippines because of our tropical climate. There are not a few observers who profess to believe that Japan views the Philippines while an American possession as a distinct menace to her from a military standpoint, and that the American flag in the Philippines will bring the Japanese soldiers to our shores far quicker than the flag of a Philippine republic. Suppose the unexpected would happen and that the United States and Japan should go to war. The Philippines would immediately become the bloody battle ground, for the United States could not prevent the Japanese from gaining possession of the islands at the outbreak of such a war. The contest would then be centered in the islands, and by the time it would be concluded the Philippines would be likely to be little more than a shambles. On the other hand, if we have our independence, Japan would have no reason to molest us in case of war, because we would not be American territory and a Philippine republic would be no menace to Japan. If we are granted our independence we will endeavor to deal honorably with our neighbor—Japan—just as with all other countries, and we will then view the future with confidence in humanity. In any event, we would be taking no more chance with independence without protection than we are taking now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from the Philippines has expired.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should have an audience and I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of no quorum and the Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. GABALDON. But even granting there was danger of Japanese aggression, it has been completely removed by the four-power treaty.

We have always taken the position we would be glad to receive independence, either with or without protection, just as it pleased the United States. The recent agitation in the United States and the declarations of the Wood-Forbes report on independence with protection has resulted in the Filipino people uniting on a policy of independence without protection. At the Nacionalista convention, at which the "independence-without-protection" plank was adopted, Manuel L. Quezon, Filipino leader and president of the Philippine Senate, said:

The time has come for the Filipino people through the Nacionalista Party to make a clear, frank, and unequivocal expression on the question of independence—complete and absolute independence. We do not want or need her protection. It is unworthy of a people who clamor for independence to ask help or protection or compassion. There are no enemies to fear, no ambitious nations waiting to grab us. Independence of the Philippines will be recognized not only by Europe but also by the nations of the Orient.

The party took issue with the recent recommendation of Secretary of War Weeks and Gov. Gen. Wood to the legislature that the provincial government "get out of business and stay out." The convention adopted a resolution declaring in favor of government participation in business, giving as the reason for this policy the hesitancy of private capital to enter into the business field here.

FOUR RECOMMENDATIONS, ALL REACTIONARY.

The Wood-Forbes report contains four recommendations. I have too much confidence in President Harding to believe he will recommend that Congress should enact the necessary law to carry them out. The recommendations are autocratic, militaristic, and reactionary, not compatible with American history, American institutions, or the teachings of America's great men of the past.

In this connection, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the fact that as recently as August 25, 1921, President Quezon, of the Philippine Senate, had a long and highly satisfactory interview with President Harding at the White House. On that occasion President Harding declared "very emphatically that in no case would a backward policy be pursued" in Philippine affairs. There can be no misunderstanding as to the assurance given Mr. Quezon, because at the close of the interview President Harding personally O. K'd the quoted words, which were part of a statement the Philippine Senate president had prepared for the press. As all four of the recommendations of the Wood-Forbes report embrace a "backward policy," I feel sure the President will not approve them. I will consider the four recommendations in the order in which they are made in the report:

1. We recommend that the present general status of the Philippine Islands continue until the people have had time to absorb and thoroughly master the powers already in their hands.

The last previous Governor General of the Philippines, who served in that capacity for seven years, and was therefore at least as well qualified to judge conditions as the members of the mission, officially recommended to Congress and the President of the United States "independence now." Delayed independence is certainly a step backward from a position of "independence now." Not only that, but the language of this recommendation does not hold out to the Filipinos any hope for independence at any time.

2. We recommend that the responsible representative of the United States, the Governor General, have authority commensurate with the responsibilities of his position. In case of failure to secure the necessary corrective action by the Philippine Legislature, we recommend that Congress declare null and void legislation which has been enacted diminishing, limiting, or dividing the authority granted the Governor General under act No. 240 of the Sixty-fourth Congress, known as the Jones bill.

This recommendation, if carried out, would deprive the Filipino people of important participation in their local government. It is a step backward, and would therefore be a serious violation of President Harding's promise of "no backward policies."

3. We recommend that in case of a deadlock between the Governor General and the Philippine Senate in the confirmation of appointments that the President of the United States be authorized to make and render the final decision.

This is simply another step in the dispossessing of the people of the Philippine Islands of that measure of self-government which they now enjoy. It is a part of the general plan outlined in the report of turning the wheels of Philippine government in a direction opposite from progress.

4. We recommend that under no circumstances should the American Government permit to be established in the Philippine Islands a situation which would leave the United States in a position of responsibility without authority.

On the other hand, is the principle that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" to be entirely ignored by the American Governor General in the Philippines?

It is not the fault of the Filipinos that the American flag flies over our land, for they resisted American sovereignty for more than two years, until finally forced to yield to superior arms.

The Filipino people have repeatedly asked to be allowed to assume full responsibility as well as full authority.

Under recommendation No. 4 the United States could justitfy "taxation without representation," but not with honor to itself or without reducing the immortal Declaration of Independence to a mere scrap of paper. And I know that this great Nation is not ready to do that.

REPORT ADMITS CHRISTIAN FILIPINOS WANT INDEPENDENCE.

I desire now to take up in detail some of the general conclusions and recommendations of the report. One of the conclusions was:

We find everywhere among the Christian Filipinos the desire for independence, generally under the protection of the United States. The non-Christians and the Americans are for continuance of American control.

Many American newspapers have commented on this statement as favorable to the Filipino aspirations for independence. I will quote two of many comments that have come to my observation:

[From the Dallas (Tex.) News.]

WHAT'S THE ANSWER?

What inference are we to draw from the fact that the Christian Filipinos (9,350,240) want us to get out and the pagans (540,054) all want us to stay?

[From the Paterson (N. J.) Press-Guardian.]

GEN. WOOD'S REPORT.

Gen. Wood's report contains the following notable statement: "We find everywhere among the Christian Filipinos (9,350,240) the desire for independence. * * * The non-Christians (1,000,480) and Americans (6,931) are for continuance of American control."

This is a surprising situation. It would naturally be expected that the educated, property-owning, and commercial classes would favor American control as providing greater safety, while the less intelligent classes would more generally respond to sentiment based on the love of liberty which is found among all peoples, whatever their stage of civilization.

Plainly, the educated Filipinos have confidence in their ability to govern the islands.

Other findings of the mission which have brought forth much criticism by the American press are:

"We find that the government is not reasonably free from those underlying causes which result in the destruction of government.

"We find there is a disquieting lack of confidence in the administration of justice, to an extent which constitutes a menace to the stability of government."

The New York World and the Springfield (Mass.) Republican answer these statements in the following editorials:

[From the New York World.]

THEY MIGHT CONSULT MR. TAFT.

It is necessary in reading the report of Gen. Leonard Wood and W. Cameron Forbes on the Philippines to keep in mind that it is a backward country, where the enlightened ideas of America make slow growth. Among other unfavorable opinions they say:

"We find there is a disquieting lack of confidence in the administration of justice, to an extent which constitutes a menace to the stability of the government."

Only a few days ago Mr. Forbes, who has just returned from the Far East, in speaking of the Philippines, said:

"One of the principal things we found was that justice was not satisfactorily administered. The delay in getting decisions is very bad. There are a variety of causes—not enough judges and not always the right kind of judges. We found something like 50,000 pending cases, including those in the municipal courts. We shall have to do something drastic to meet that situation."

What would Gen. Wood and Mr. Forbes have to say if in the course of their investigation they had come upon a case in the Manila courts where two men arrested on the charge of larceny had appeared for trial 72 times, always to discover that the prosecution was too busy to proceed with their trial? It was in New York City that this happened, and in dismissing the bail bonds of the two men Judge Mulqueen in general sessions commented that he had never heard of a more ridiculous travesty on justice.

Some years ago an American of distinction, who, like Mr. Forbes, had been Governor General of the Philippines, later President of the United States, and is to-day Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, spoke most unfavorably of the administration of justice in the United States. William H. Taft was well qualified to pass judgment in the matter. In his reflection, which had no ulterior political purpose, on the maladministration of justice, legal delays and disadvantages suffered by poorer litigants he was unsparing.

Conditions in the Philippines are probably no worse than in the United States generally or New York City locally, but Mr. Forbes, fresh from the insular possessions of the United States in the Far East, has decided that "we shall have to do something drastic to meet that situation" in the Philippines. In the meantime, what are we doing at home to correct abuses long known and long tolerated?

[From the Springfield (Mass.) Republican.]

THE WOOD-FORBES REPORT.

The conclusions of the Wood-Forbes Commission concerning conditions in the Philippine Islands are unexpectedly favorable to Filipino nationalist aspirations. True, these investigators advise that independence be postponed until the people "have had time to absorb and thoroughly master the power already in their hands," but it is significant that the report does not declare them incapable of self-government or even unfit for it within a decent period of tutelage.

"We find the people happy, peaceful, and in the main prosperous," the investigators report. That is a good deal to say of any subject or quasi-subject people. The Irish may be prosperous, but they are neither happy nor peaceful. If after some five years of the nearly autonomous government set up by the Jones law, signed by President Wilson, the Filipinos are all three—happy, peaceful, and prosperous—that law can not have been so bad as its critics have asserted.

If it were said of America by some foreign visitors:

"Many Americans have shown marked capacity for government service and the young generation is full of promise; the civil service laws have in the main been honestly administered, but there is a marked deterioration due to the injection of politics."

If that were said of our country, no one would be inclined to dispute it. The fact that the same thing is now said of the Filipinos does not amount to a very crushing indictment. In view of criticisms of the administration of criminal justice in this country by a certain celebrated committee of which Mr. Hughes was a member, and of Chief Justice Taft's criticisms before he returned to the bench, it need not alarm one exceedingly to read of the Philippines that "there is a disquieting lack of confidence in the administration of justice, to an extent which constitutes a menace to the stability of the government." The Filipino lynching record does not compare with our own.

Nor is the subjoined extract a very damning indictment of Filipino native administration, in view of the fact that the governor of Illinois is now out on bail and that our State supreme court is about to try our second Massachusetts district attorney within a year for malfeasance in office:

"We find that a reasonable proportion of officials and employees are men of good character and ability and reasonably faithful to the trust imposed upon them, but that the efficiency of the public services has fallen off and that they are now relatively inefficient, due to lack of inspections and to the too rapid transfer of control to officials who have not had the necessary time for proper training."

Gen. Wood and Mr. Forbes have obviously tried to be scrupulously fair and to forget their prepossessions against Filipino nationalism and the administration of Gov. Gen. Harrison. They merit congratulations. From their own testimony it seems a fair conclusion that the present powers of self-government which the natives enjoy should not be curtailed.

PHILIPPINES ONCE HAD A REPUBLIC.

The report of the mission would have the reader infer the Filipinos have always been a subject people. In fact, the exact words on this subject are: "In considering the question of granting independence to the Philippine Islands it is of interest to note that they have always been a dependent group under the influence of a stronger power."

I claim that this statement is historically untrue. The whole world knows that at the time of the Filipino revolution in 1898 the Filipinos had a republic with a constitution that compared very favorably with that of the United States. We had practically already won our independence from Spain when the Americans arrived.

FRANCIS BURTON HARRISON STILL DEAR TO FILIPINOS.

The report by innuendo criticizes the administration of Francis Burton Harrison, who was the American Governor General of the Philippine Islands for seven and a half years. No greater honor could befall me as a representative of the 10,500,000 inhabitants of the Philippine Islands than to be the Filipino to report to the Congress of the United States that Francis Burton Harrison has the reputation of being the most American American official that ever served in the islands. When Mr. Harrison went to the Philippines there was a very strained relationship between Filipinos and Americans. The present cordial attitude of Filipinos toward America is due more to the administration of Mr. Harrison than any other one cause. By his gentlemanly conduct, his integrity, his efficiency, his human sympathy, and last but not least by his genuine Americanism, Gov. Harrison won the love and confidence of the Filipino people not only for himself but for the United States of America. His policies were: The Philippines for the Filipinos; teach the Filipinos to do things for themselves, self-determination, and the principle that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. I can say with pride to Francis Burton Harrison that his long service to the Filipino people is not unappreciated simply because he has left our shores, perhaps never to return. We have not forgotten him. He has made himself immortal to the Philippine nation. [Applause.]

DR. GUY POTTER BENTON ON FILIPINO CHARACTER.

I wish to allude also to another American who is rapidly winning the confidence of the Filipino people, Dr. Guy Potter Benton, former president of the University of Vermont, and now president of the University of the Philippines. Dr. Benton, upon concluding a year's administration of our university, has signed up for 10 years. In his recent inaugural address, speaking of Filipino character, he said:

For 30 years I have had association with great crowds of young people, and I am able to testify, on the bases of experience and observation, that I have never come in contact with a brighter, better, more eager, industrious, or promising company of young men and women than the 4,000 who to-day compose the student body of the University of the Philippines. The Filipino as a race are not "born short," either morally or mentally, and I wish I might give my words the voice of thunder and the wings of lightning to refute this vile slander against a people of proven character and ability, so that the reputation might echo and reecho with convincing finality the world around.

AN APPEAL TO THE HEART OF AMERICA.

Again, referring to the report of the mission, in concluding, allow me to say:

In behalf of the people of the Philippine Islands, inheritors of centuries of struggle for liberty, I, one of those whom they have designated to speak for them, enter my most solemn protest against the report of the Wood-Forbes mission.

With all earnestness, in all sobriety of thought and purpose, with all the respect and honor due from us to the great American Nation, our benefactor, I protest against that report, because it is inaccurate, unfair, misleading, unrighteous, uninformed, and unenlightened.

I protest against the conclusion it sometimes expresses and sometimes insinuates that the people of the Philippine Islands are not fitted for self-government. I deny that conclusion and repudiate it. I point to the overwhelming and unanswerable refutation of that conclusion contained in the records and facts of the last five years. Five years ago the government of the Philippine Islands passed into the hands of the people thereof. For these five years they have administered it. They have with their own selections filled all but three of the high offices in the island government. Their legislature, elected by their suffrage, has made all the laws that have been made. Their officers, chosen in accordance with their will, have directed and controlled all public affairs. I submit that this test is sufficient. I submit that it annihilates the disparaging intimations contained in this report. And I submit that facts, records, statistics, and observation will establish to any impartial tribunal that the government so conducted in the Philippine Islands compares favorably with the government of any other democracy anywhere in this world for the same period.

But I protest again that this report disingenuously and unfairly evades the real issue. The Filipinos have demonstrated their capacity for self-government by governing themselves, but that is not and can not be the question now. In the covenant entered into on August 29, 1916, between the people of the United States and the people of the Philippine Islands the people of the United States pledged themselves to grant independence to the Philippine Islands "as soon as a stable government can be established therein." The stable government has been established; it has been subjected to five years of trial; the fact that it is stable has been daily demonstrated and is not questioned. The real issue, the only issue, the plain, direct question from which, people of America, this report seeks to divert your attention, is whether the United States will or will not fulfill its sacred obligations. We have done our part; we have fulfilled to the letter our share of the terms of the contract. People of America, will you fulfill yours?

Great and powerful interests that derive a profit from the existing status seek to becloud the issue and deceive you into committing an act of bad faith and staining the proud American name with the blot of a broken promise. It is this power that furnishes the chief strength to the opposition to our just request; it is this power alone that rejoices in this report. We earnestly beg you, people of America, our good friends and sympathizers, not to be misled by it. For ourselves we thrust it aside as irrelevant and immaterial and beg the serious heed of the American Nation to the faith that this report impugns and dishonors. Americans, we seek the liberty your forefathers won to you. We declare to you on our solemn word of honor, in that plain fashion of man to man you justly prefer and practice, that the Philippine people will never accept anything else. We declare to you that we love liberty with the same love that you have for it. We declare on our honor and faith and by the cause your own magnificent history has sanctified that we utterly reject the insinuation that you are willing to become the oppressors of a nation striving to be free. We say to you that we long for our country's independence and we ask for it at your hands. And we say to you that anything else is as irksome to us as it would be to you. In the name of your own liberty, we ask you to break our bonds and to break them now.

IMPORTANT ARTICLE BY MANUEL L. QUEZON.

I desire to include in my remarks for preservation in the files of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an important article on Philippine independence by Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate, who is known personally to most of the Members of the House.

AMERICA'S PLEDGE TO THE PHILIPPINES.

[By Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate. Reprinted from Asia Magazine.]

From the beginning of the American occupation the Filipino people have been assured by the highest representatives of the American Nation that the fixed purpose of the United States was the ultimate independence of the islands. In August, 1916, Congress gave formal statement of that purpose in the Jones Act, which solemnly pledged the faith of the people of the United States to set the people of the Philippine Islands free as soon as they should prove their right to independence by the establishment of a stable government. The question is, then, have they succeeded in establishing such a government?

The Jones Act gave the Filipinos a very large share in their own government. It placed all of the important executive and administrative offices in the islands, with the exception of the governor generalship, the vice governor generalship, and the auditorship in the hands of native Filipinos. It created a popularly elected legislature, to which was committed the control of all the affairs of the island peoples, excepting only their relations with foreign countries and a few matters affecting their relations with the United States. Every member of this legislature is a native Filipino.

For five years the government of the Philippines has been, in practically all respects, native. Men chosen by the will of the people, deliberately and freely expressed, have administered public offices, provincial, municipal, and national. Though mistakes have been made by the Philippine government, as mistakes have been made by other more experienced governments, it can safely be said that the people of the islands have managed their affairs wisely and patriotically. Public order has been effectively maintained. Means of communication have been improved and extended. Facilities for public education have been increased. Measures for sanitation and health have been put into effect. The finances of the government have been managed under native direction as ably and successfully as they ever have been managed. Indeed, one great improvement in the handing of government finances has been made during the Filipino administration—the adoption of a budget system, similar to that which has only recently been put into effect for the United States. Under this system the secretary of finance (a Filipino) prepares, in consultation with the heads of other departments (who, with the exception of the secretary of public instruction, are also Filipinos), the budget for the coming fiscal year, including estimates of revenues and expenditures of the government. This budget is submitted by the secretary of finance to the legislature for consideration and action. Though the legislature retains the power to accept, reject, or entirely ignore the budget as submitted, in practice it has never appropriated anything for purposes not recommended by the secretary of finance. Thus, the "pork barrel" has been completely done away with in the Philippines.

In spite of reports to the contrary that have appeared in newspapers in the United States, the Philippine government is sound financially. For several years, at the end of every fiscal year, there has been a surplus in the insular treasury. In no case has the yearly expense of the government exceeded its revenue. That the Philippine government has been embarrassed this year to the extent of having been compelled to reduce its expenses is due not to bad financing on the part of the government itself, but to the losses suffered by the Philippine National Bank and to the tying up of the bank's funds in nonliquid securities. The Philippine National Bank is the government's depository, and the majority of its stock is owned by the government. It has, accordingly, been to the interest of the government to help the bank out of its rather difficult situation by withdrawing government deposits as slowly as possible. What happened to the Philippine National Bank was not any worse than what has happened to banks in the United States and in other countries. It has not been necessary to decree a moratorium in the Philippines. The Philippine bank has suffered as a result of the general business depression that has followed the war. It is true that some of its losses were due to mismanagement, but the officials of the Philippine government have long since corrected this evil by appointing as manager of the bank a competent banker from the United States.

Though the business depression that marked the passing of the abnormal conditions attendant upon the Great War has been world wide, it has perhaps affected the Philippines rather more than some other regions, because the staple products of the islands were subject to a greatly stimulated war demand which abruptly ceased with peace. Hemp, for instance, and coconut oil and sugar, of which the Philippines produce large quantities, fell in market value far below the lowest point reached under normal conditions. But business in the islands is steadily improving, and I can not help thinking that a country which has successfully passed through a crisis such as the one the Philippines has just weathered has proved that it has not only a stable but a manifestly capable government.

Many of those who are opposed to Philippine freedom say that for the United States to withdraw from the islands would be, virtually, to give them over to Japan. That possibility does not worry the people of the Philippines a bit. They believe that, even if Japan has designs upon the islands, she is wise enough to know that for her to take them over after they had been granted independence by the United States would do her more harm than good. Japan is suspected in many quarters of being an aggressive and unscrupulous conquering power, and the Japanese people, aware of this fact, are anxious to prove to the world that they are unjustly accused. They realize that nothing Japan could do would justify that suspicion more than interference with an independent Philippine republic established by the United States. Such action would be resented by Great Britain, France, and other powers with colonies in the Orient, as well as by the United States, not only because of its disregard of international law, but because of its menace to Far Eastern peace.

There are a few people who frankly advocate the reversal of the policies enunciated in the Jones Act. They say that since a Congress is empowered to amend or repeal any law enacted by its predecessor, the promise of independence contained in the act can properly be rejected. Legally, they are right. Every Congress repeals and amends statutes that have been outgrown, but when a pronouncement by one Congress affects the interests of another people, who have accepted it as a pledge of faith, no subsequent Congress can repudiate it without placing the United States in the category with nations that disregard their treaty compacts. The effect of such a step upon the Filipinos would be to alienate their good will and good faith, which, after all, are the best assets the United States has in the Far East. From whatever point of view the possession of the Philippines by the United States may be considered, the good will of the people is of paramount importance. Commercially the Philippines will be profitable to the United States only so long as the people of the islands are willing to cooperate with American enterprises and consume American products. Strategically, the islands will be a source of strength only so long as the loyalty of their inhabitants can be depended upon. If the United States should hold the Philippines against the will of the population, they would surely prove a liability instead of an asset. On the other hand, an independent Philippine government would be grateful to America; it would continue in its existing economic relationship with the United States to the mutual benefit of both parties concerned; it would grant to the United States the coaling stations required for maintaining a strategic position in the Pacific. In short, the Filipinos could be relied upon to express their friendship in tangible form.

I do not believe that there will ever be the slightest serious move on the part of the United States toward departure from the plain terms of the Jones Act. I think that the American people will abide by their promise to grant Philippine independence. The time to fulfill that promise has arrived. There has been established in the Philippines a stable government of and by and for Filipinos. The Filipino people have their hearts set on independence. Faithfully and completely they have carried out their part of the contract embodied in the Jones Act. They ask America to carry out its part. The Philippine question is a question of ethics and not of policy, a question of conscience and not of expediency.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, after listening to the able defense by the gentleman from Illinois of Marshall Field & Co., and the eloquence that has been expended on behalf of Boston Harbor, it might not be out of place to digress for a little while on behalf of our ex-service men.

A great deal has been said from time to time upon the floor of this House with reference to the treatment received by the sick and disabled veterans of the World War.

That there were just grounds for complaint can not be doubted. It was not so much that Congress had not provided the necessary funds as a failure on the part of administrative agencies to function. Congress has made ample provision, and if any of our disabled are suffering, it is not because we have not provided necessary funds. Since the reorganization of the various bureaus having to do with the welfare of the disabled ex-service men was effected, however, there has been a very marked improvement in the service.

While the efficiency of the bureau is not all that was hoped for by its sponsors, the services rendered are such that comparatively few complaints are now being registered by ex-service men—at least from my district. The promptness and efficiency of the congressional division is particularly gratifying. It is only necessary to furnish the necessary proof and data in any meritorious case to secure quick action by the bureau.

But while we have done much for the sick and disabled, we have done nothing to adjust the economic loss sustained by those who entered the service. Nearly all donned the uniform gladly. They did their bit. Their patriotism and valor measured up to the best traditions of their country. Many of them gained imperishable fame, but paid for it the last great price. Their bodies now slumber under the green sod of France. Others, equally brave, did their full share upon bloody battle fields to stay the onward march of imperial greed, cruelty, and force. They turned the tide of the Great War and forever blasted the hopes and ambitions of autocratic power.

Civilization and free government owe them much. We as a people owe them more. Shall we forget them now that all danger is past? Shall we rest in the security that they have bought with their sacrifices and refuse to repay them at least a part of the heavy losses they sustained? We can never pay them adequately for dangers encountered or sufferings endured, but we can make good at least a fair average of the actual financial loss sustained by each of them. No more is asked; no less should be granted.

It is not that I have been pressed by ex-service men to take up the cudgels on their behalf, for I have not received to exceed a half dozen letters or requests from them to support an adjusted compensation bill. Two of my own brothers were in the service. One of them enlisted at 18 and served for many months in France. Neither one has so much as mentioned additional compensation to me, though both sustained financial loss. I am personally acquainted with many others in my district who sustained losses as a result of being taken from their farms and business. In many cases such losses run into thousands. Some of these have as yet been unable to become reestablished. To them adjusted compensation would come as a godsend.

The proposed Fordney compensation bill, H. R. 1, which has been pending in this House since the opening day of the last session, can in no sense be considered as providing for a gratuity, but is a belated acknowledgment of what we owe its beneficiaries. The sooner it is routed out of the committee and put upon its passage the quicker we shall do simple justice to our ex-service men.

But it is said that to do this is to cheapen the patriotism of the men and to put a price upon devotion to country. Did not those who remained at home owe as much to their country as those who were drafted? Can anyone give a good reason why those who served in the defense of our liberties should give their time at a comparative pittance, while those of military age who remained at their jobs received high wages and good salaries for an 8-hour day?

It seems to me no convincing reason can be given. True, every man owes it to his country to serve it in time of need, but the country owes it to him to adjust his economic loss so far as possible.

I am convinced that this is the view of the great majority of the American people. Certain it is that wherever the question of a bonus has been submitted to the voters of the several States that it has carried by most decisive majorities. No less than 13 States have made provision for cash payments to their men, but this does not relieve the National Government of its obligation.

It seems to be generally admitted both in Government circles and in Congress that something should be done to adjust the financial loss sustained by our ex-service men as a result of being taken from their accustomed occupations and put into the Army, but objection is raised because of the strain it will place upon the National Treasury. No one who is at all familiar with the difficulty of raising the necessary revenues can ignore the force of this objection, but the mere fact that it presents a most difficult problem is no reason why we should longer delay consideration of the compensation bill.

The cutting down of the Army and Navy as a result of the peace conference should effect vast economies. The War Department now holds reserve equipment for an Army of 150,000 men, aggregating in value some $5,500,000,000, or $36,000 worth of materials for every soldier now in the standing Army. At least half of this should be declared surplus and sold. This alone would go a long way in providing the necessary funds for the first payments. Not only would it bring in needed cash, but large savings would be effected in the matter of storage and supervision. To meet future installments it is entirely feasible to increase the estate tax, and the revenue from this source should be expressly reserved for the benefit of the soldiers' compensation fund.

Our foreign loans, aggregating about $11,000,000,000 for principal and interest, should be funded at the earliest possible date. The interest from this huge sum alone would more than care for the installments of the soldiers' adjusted compensation. It is no argument to say that our foreign debtors are too poor to pay. No effort has been made to collect. If France could pay her men as adjusted compensation $233.58 apiece; Great Britain from $140 for privates to $7,290 for major generals, and Italy from $369.92 to $852.42 for major generals, with war debts vastly larger than our own, then they can pay us interest as it accumulates if the Government insists. Difficulties in the way of financing the payment of the soldiers' proposed adjusted compensation is by no means insuperable, and the time has come when we should take action upon the compensation bill, which has so long slumbered in the archives of the Ways and Means Committee. [Applause.]

Not only this, gentlemen of the House, but I do not believe that we should permit the Senate of the United States to take the initiative in the passage of this bill. [Applause.] I believe that we, as Members of the House, who are familiar with the handicap suffered by our ex-service men, owe it to them to take the initiative. The bill ought to be reported out and put on its passage without any further delay. [Applause.]

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, the bill which the House has under consideration contains the following provision:

For expenses of the Alien Property Custodian authorized by the act entitled "An act to define, regulate, and punish trading with the enemy, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, as amended, $370,000.

The moneys appropriated by this bill do not become available until July 1 next. This bill authorizes an appropriation for the support of the Alien Property Custodian's office for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923. It contemplates that that office shall be in operation four years and eight months after the signing of the armistice. The act of October 6, 1917, also contains the following provision:

After the end of the war any claim of an enemy or of an ally of an enemy of any money or other property received and held by the Alien Property Custodian or deposited in the United States Treasury shall be settled as Congress shall direct.

More than three years have elapsed since the end of the war, and yet Congress has enacted no general law authorizing the return of property held by the Alien Property Custodian. Certain claims of alien enemies, who have been able to wield sufficient influence, have been favored with special legislation authorizing the custodian to restore their property, while others, whose claims were far more meritorious, have been ignored by this Congress.

Under the provisions of the act approved October 6, 1917, the custodian seized and took over property belonging to alien enemies amounting to approximately $900,000,000. According to a statement made by the Alien Property Custodian before the Committee on Appropriations on the 20th day of December last, there still remains in his possession $418,727,969.30. He states further that of this amount $29,094,164 belongs to Americans.

Some cases of trusts held by him have been called to my attention which to my mind constitute glaring examples of injustice. There is an unfortunate fellow in St. Louis, who is sick and without funds, while the Alien Property Custodian here in Washington is still holding approximately $12,000 which constitutes all of his resources. He was an able chemist, living in Vienna. In 1901 an industrial concern in St. Louis brought him to this country. He liked the country, and after a few years concluded to become an American citizen and make this country his home. He made his declaration in due form and received his first papers. Later on he married. By frugal and industrious habits he accumulated and invested his money in American property. His old mother lived in Vienna. He wanted her to meet and to know his wife.

In 1914 he applied for and received a vacation from his employer. He took his wife and went to Vienna and was caught in the whirlpool of the World War, which made it impossible for him to return home. After much difficulty he succeeded in escaping military service, which would have compelled him to fight against this country. As soon as the war was over and he could procure a passport he returned to this country, his home, for the purpose of completing his citizenship and pursuing his endeavors. And now, more than three years after the armistice, the custodian still holds his property, not because of any disposition on the part of the custodian to retain the same but because Congress has neglected and failed to authorize the return of this property to its owner.

Mr. ROACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. I have this kind of a case in my district. A boy was befriended in Germany years ago. He came to this country, became an American citizen, married, raised a good family, and accumulated considerable property. He died during the war. In his will he left $10,000 for those who befriended him in childhood in Germany. The Alien Property Custodian seized the money and is still holding it here in Washington, while the beneficiaries for whom the deceased had left the money are in Germany in want. I can see no excuse for this Government continuing to hold property of this kind and thus preventing it from being delivered to those for whom it was left.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I know another case of a professor who held a chair of history and economics in Lombard College at Galesburg, Ill. By rigid economy he had saved funds, which he invested in this country. In due time he made his declaration to become an American citizen and received his first papers. The president of the college and the educators associated with him have testified to his character and refinement. Early in 1914 his father, who lived in Germany, died. His mother, who was old, had difficulty in settling the estate. During the summer vacation of the college that year he went back to see his mother in the old country and to aid her in straightening out her affairs. He had been there only a few days when war was declared, and his return home was thus rendered impossible. The president of the college advised me that his chair was left vacant and that his place was filled with great difficulty. The custodian seized and took over all of his property. As soon as the war was over he sought to come back to this country, but the State Department refused to visé his passport on the ground that he was an alien enemy, and not until a few weeks ago did the department concede to grant such a visé. He is still in Germany, without funds, while the Alien Property Custodian, now more than three years after the armistice was signed, is still holding his property here in Washington.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why do they not turn it back to him?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Because Congress has not given the custodian the authority to do so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I had one turned over to-day, and the check was sent to-day.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; but the gentleman will find that the facts in his case were different. The department holds that residence and first papers in this country are of no avail; that a native of Germany or Austria, who has not completed his citizenship, has the status of an alien enemy, and under the law, as now in force, the custodian has no authority to release his property. I could relate innumerable cases similar to those described.

I appealed to the Alien Property Custodian recently in behalf of the Lombard College professor. He replied that in view of the facts presented in this case, under the law, he was unable to act favorably upon the claim. He concluded his letter as follows:

> The status of the property of alien enemies held by this office will depend upon future legislation of Congress, and until Congress passes such legislation I am unable to take action in these matters.

In my judgment, the custodian's interpretation of the law is correct. He has no authority to act and will have no authority to act until such authority is conferred by legislation enacted by this Congress. And how long, I wonder, will Congress continue to delay the performing of a duty which justice and fair dealing demand?

The only pretext which we had for seizing alien property was that the property might be used as a resource to aid our enemies in the conflict, and under the exigencies of war we seized it to prevent this, and now, more than three years after the conflict is over and after our enemies have been vanquished, after a treaty has been signed and peace proclaimed, we are still holding on to this property, and no effort is being made to return it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not this the first case in any war where the Government appropriated the property of aliens domiciled in the country and deprived them of its use during the war?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. As far as I know, it is; and the worst of it is the property still held by the custodian involves 32,226 separate trusts. There are a number of trusts, like the German Lloyd Steamship Co., which amount to millions of dollars. On the other hand, there are thousands of trusts involving only a few hundred dollars, which belong to people who are in dire need, while more than three years after the war has ceased we continue to hold their property under a pretext of a war necessity.

As I stated before, the custodian seized alien property amounting to approximately $900,000,000. Approximately $500,000,000 of that property has been returned to the owners who were specially favored by legislation enacted by Congress. Who was this favored class? The most despicable of all the Germans and the one charged with the grossest violation of our hospitality was Count von Bernstorff, the German ambassador. A rich American woman forfeited her American citizenship and married him as a matter of choice. Innumerable other American heiresses spurned American young men and married German titles. We have ignored the claims of innumerable people in Germany, who thought enough of this country to invest their savings here and who are now in dire want and distress, while we have authorized the custodian to turn over to Mrs. von Bernstorff a million dollars, and we have released many millions more to supply luxuries to German counts and barons made rich by marrying American wealth. For one, I assert without reserve that I would infinitely prefer to release money to a German woman who did not have an opportunity to marry an American boy than to return funds to these rich women who, as a matter of choice, abandoned their country and forfeited their citizenship in order to marry a title in Germany. [Applause.]

There are those in this country who are bold enough to assert that the property still held by the custodian should be confiscated and that the proceeds should be used to satisfy the claims of our nationals against the Government of Germany. I do not believe, however, that there is any considerable number among us who would be willing to thus prostitute our national honor. On the 2d day of April, 1917, the eve of the declaration of war, the President in a message personally delivered to Congress used these words:

> We are glad, now that we can see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its people, the German people included.

On that same day the President, while speaking to Congress, further said:

> We have no quarrel with the German people. We have no feeling toward them but one of sympathy and friendship. It was not upon their impulse that their Government entered into this war. It was not with their previous knowledge or approval. It was a war determined upon, as wars used to be determined upon in the old unhappy days, when peoples were nowhere consulted by their rulers, and wars were provoked and waged in the interest of dynasties or a little group of ambitious men who were accustomed to use their fellow men as pawns and tools.

Thus did the President proclaim the friendship and sympathy of this Government for the plain people of Germany. We declared then that we were not fighting the people of Germany, that we were fighting the Kaiser and the Hohenzollerns and the military leaders who had oppressed the plain people of that country. We caused these declarations to be printed in the German language and to be scattered by airplanes over the German trenches. The German armies were still in France and Belgium, far beyond the German frontier. The soldiers who were drafted from the ranks of the German people believed in our proffered friendship; they mutinied; they broke the morale of the German Army; they drove the Kaiser from the fatherland; they overthrew the military government and set up a Republic, and now, three years after the conflict is ended, when the blood has had time to cool, there are those among us who are bold enough and selfish enough to propose that we confiscate the property of the plain people of that country, who trusted us even in war; who were not consulted about starting the war; who had no control over its conduct; who had no power to stop it, and it is proposed to confiscate that property to pay damages resulting from depredations committed by rulers and military leaders who have been overthrown and banished. If there is honor left in this country, confiscation will not be considered.

Our nationals have claims against the German Government many of which are just and which should be paid, but why have these claims not been presented? Why were they not presented at the Versailles conference? Why were they not allowed and provided for in the treaty between the United States and Germany, which was negotiated and was ratified last year? Why do we not present them to the German Government now? But it is contended that we must hold the property of these nationals, who were helpless to prevent or control the war, in order to coerce Germany into paying our claims. Not only would such a course be indefensible in dealing with helpless and irresponsible claimants, and a breach of faith in the friendship we proffered, but it is totally unnecessary, and it would be utterly ineffective in enforcing such claims.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is it not in violation of the fundamental principles that no country can confiscate the private property of an alien who is located within its boundaries?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. That is absolutely true. If this Government is to enforce its claims against Germany, it must do it by economical pressure. Germany is seeking and must have a market here. Suppose that when the claims of our nationals have been allowed our Government says to the Government of Germany, "Until these claims have been paid, goods manufactured in Germany will not be received into the ports of the United States." In that event how long do you think it would be before every American claim would be paid in full?

This question means infinitely more than justice and fair dealings to the nationals whose property we hold. It involves the very honor of our Government. We have proclaimed among the nations of the earth that the terms of treaties are sacred, and that nations who have honor will observe them. We condemn Germany because we said that she entered into treaties and broke them. A treaty dealing with this very subject existed between this country and Germany at the time the war began. I know it has been argued that the war broke all treaties, but let us see whether or not this contention is true. Article 23 of the treaty in force between the United States and Germany at the time the war began reads as follows:

> If war should arise between the two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects, and without molestation or hindrance; and all women and children, scholars of every faculty, cultivators of the earth, artisans, manufacturers, and fishermen, unarmed and inhabiting unfortified towns, villages, or places, and, in general, all others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind, shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed, nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy, in whose power by the events of the war they may happen to fall; but if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

The views of our Government relative to the treaty provision which I have just read are set forth in a memorandum prepared for Senator Martin by the State Department. This memorandum was dated March 7, 1918, practically one year after the war began, and contained the following provision:

As a general rule treaties of amity and commerce, such as this one is, will be discontinued or terminated by war between the contracting parties, except as to articles specially provided for the continuation of war. As article 23, above quoted, contemplates a state of war, it is regarded as in force between the United States and Germany.

Not only did our State Department concede, after the war had been in progress for one year, that the treaty provision between the United States and Germany, dealing with the treatment of nationals in enemy countries and with the property owned by them, had remained in full force during the war, but the language of the treaty provision itself shows clearly that it was intended to apply only in the event war should arise between such countries. Note the language:

If war should arise between two contracting parties, the merchants of either country then residing in the other shall be allowed to remain nine months to collect their debts and settle their affairs, and may depart freely, carrying off all their effects without molestation or hindrance.

If any Member of this House can reconcile that provision with a suggestion that we confiscate any of the property now held by the custodian, I should be delighted to have him do so. Note the further language:

All others whose occupations are for the common subsistence and benefit of mankind shall not be molested in their persons, nor shall their houses or goods be burnt or otherwise destroyed, nor their fields wasted by the armed force of the enemy in whose power by the event of war they may happen to fall. But if anything is necessary to be taken from them for the use of such armed force, the same shall be paid for at a reasonable price.

If any Member of this House thinks he can reconcile our conduct in dealing with alien property with the plain meaning of this language, I should be delighted to have him attempt to do so. With that solemn treaty entered into by us we scorned Germany and accused her of breaking treaties, and now more than three years after hostilities have ceased we are holding on to property belonging to German nationals, who had no control over the war, and we even find that there are some among us who are bold enough to talk of confiscation.

I have learned from various sources that the custodian, even now, more than three years after hostilities have ceased, after a treaty has been signed and a proclamation of peace issued, is still demanding the possession of property of German nationals wherever he can find it. I do not question his right or his duty to do this under the law, but to my mind the fact that this authority is still vested in him at this late date is a serious indictment against the neglect and failure of Congress to enact proper legislation dealing with this subject.

Every American has thrilled with pride at the idealism and altruism proclaimed by our American representatives and by our often repeated assertions as to the sacred regard in which we hold international treaties. I have read to you the treaty provision in force between the United States and Germany relating to the property rights of the nationals of the two countries. You are fully aware of the conduct of our Government in dealing with the property rights of the nationals of Germany. What has been Germany's conduct under that treaty provision? I am advised by the State Department that that department is in receipt of a report from the German alien property custodian, issued in February, 1921, and covering the period from May 1, 1917, to January 31, 1921, and that this report shows that the German custodian actually seized and took over American property in Germany amounting to only 118,703,100 marks, or approximately $30,000,000, and that the German custodian took over property only nominally, by merely booking the same, amounting to 339,452,330 marks, or to approximately $80,000,000. On July 21 last I was advised by the State Department that it had been informed that on January 11, 1920, the German Government had passed an ordinance authorizing the release of some of the property under the control of the custodian, and that under date of June 21, 1921, the department was advised that the German Government had announced its decision to release all of the remaining sequestrated American property, and that requests for the release of American property should be addressed to the information office of the alien property custodian in Berlin. I am also advised that the properties of the International Harvester Co., the National Cash Register Co., and of numerous other companies, which had branch offices located in Germany, were preserved and protected by the German alien property custodian, and that they were restored to their owners in a condition fully as good as when the war began. I am also advised that the German alien property custodian preserved all the various trusts held by him intact, except only in cases where the property was perishable. I regret that this statement can not be truthfully made regarding the conduct of the office of our Alien Property Custodian.

The ideals expressed by our President as to our purposes in entering the war aroused the pride of every true patriotic American. On April 2, 1917, the President in a message which he personally delivered to Congress used the following words:

We ask no indemnity for ourselves, no material compensation for the suffering we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when these rights have been made as secure as the faith and freedom of nations can make them.

Our American representatives proclaimed these lofty ideals for America at the Versailles conference, and so altruistic were they in their negotiations that they made no effort, so far as I am advised, to present American claims or to request Germany to make any provision to reimburse American nationals for damages suffered by them as a result of the depredations of Germany's military rulers who were conducting the war; and yet, while America's representatives were thus maintaining their ideals in France after hostilities had ceased, the American Alien Property Custodian was selling out, at a great sacrifice, the property of nationals of Germany who had had enough faith in this country to invest their savings here. I am advised that among the property seized and later sold at a sacrifice by the custodian were investments made in this country by citizens of Germany who made such investments in years prior to the war at the instance and solicitations of American consuls representing this country in Germany, who were endeavoring by inducing German capital to bring German inventions to this country to develop industries here.

What event in the history of this country did more to develop our industry than the advent of the Bosch magneto and Diesel engine? While the President and our American delegation were proclaiming our lofty ideals at Versailles, our custodian of alien property was engaged in selling 4,000 chemical and other patents belonging to German nationals for the munificent sum of $250,000. What has done more to develop chemistry and medical science in this country than the inventions and patents which were brought here from Germany? What has done more to relieve suffering humanity than salvarsan? The only known dependable remedy for that scourge of humanity which not only ruins the health and destroys the life of its victims, but carries its blight to innocent posterity. No one can estimate the obligation we owe to the German scientist who discovered this remedy.

The salvarsan patent was not perishable, it was not necessary for the custodian to sell it in order to protect the trust of its owner, and yet it was sold, and the custodian, whose duty it was, as trustee, to protect the property rights of the unfortunate nationals of our alien enemies, sold that patent among the 4,000 that he sold, and, if I am correctly informed, he left in the possession of his successor, to recompense the inventor, the sum of $60, which it has been suggested should be confiscated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What was it worth?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Why, a doctor gets more than that amount for treating one person. I am told that the patent is worth at least $5,000,000.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who were the purchasers?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I do not know as to that. But it looks to me as though there was a nigger in the woodpile somewhere.

It was Francis P. Garvan, a dollar a year man, a great patriot serving his country as Alien Property Custodian, who, while the President and the American delegation were at Versailles, sold out all the German chemical patents to the Chemical Foundation (Inc.), a Delaware corporation, and as soon as he had deprived the owners of the property which it was his duty as trustee to preserve and protect, he resigned as Alien Property Custodian and became the president of the Chemical Foundation. It is even asserted that he was both Alien Property Custodian and president of the Chemical Foundation at the same time for a period of one year, after which he ceased to perform his patriotic service as custodian and devoted his entire time to the Chemical Foundation. This transaction may have been regular, but I think any fair-minded man will admit that it invites strong suspicion. Lest we should deprive some one of credit to whom it is due, we must not forget that much of the management of the custodian's office, which I have described, was under the direction of A. Mitchell Palmer, later Attorney General, and now said to be of counsel to the Chemical Foundation. Palmer and Garvan in law were custodians whose duty it was to administer, protect, and preserve the trusts which were placed in their hands. In the conduct of their office, however, they were neither custodians nor trustees, they were auctioneers. [Applause.]

Think of the inconsistency of our position. The only excuse we had for seizing the property of German nationals in this country was to prevent that property from being used to aid our enemies in the conduct of the war. The conflict was ended and our enemies were vanquished more than three years ago. Our allies, England, France, and Italy, have been carrying on an extensive commerce with Germany and Austria. The commerce of the United States with Germany during the last fiscal year amounted to more than $460,000,000, and is increasing every month to an extent which is alarming. We are paying for goods from Germany in this country in amounts that are astonishing and in quantities that are endangering the industrial conditions in this country. More than that, we are encouraging our people to raise millions of dollars through charitable contributions to feed the distressed and hungry people of central Europe, and yet we are holding $418,000,000 of property belonging to the people of Germany under a pretext which only a war emergency can justify; we are holding assets which belong to the same distressed people that our American nationals are feeding through means of charity.

The courts of this country have uniformly held that there are only two purposes intended by the act creating the office of Alien Property Custodian: First, the prevention of the use of alien property by the enemy during the conflict, and, second, to preserve property located in this country which the owner of such property could not preserve because of the state of war. Neither of these purposes longer exists.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman inform us whether any bill to regulate this matter has been introduced by himself or anyone else?

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Yes; on July 9 last I introduced a bill into this House providing for the winding up of the affairs of the custodian's office by fulfilling the trusts and restoring the property still in his possession to its rightful owners. That bill was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. I have been after the chairman of that committee in an effort to get a hearing, but thus far I have been unable to get any promise and but little encouragement as to when or whether such a hearing will be held.

Mr. DICKINSON. You ought to have some more fellows after him.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. I assure the gentleman from Iowa that I will welcome the help of any Member of this House, and I feel that the conduct of this country in dealing with this property involves our national honor. In fact, it is my firm conviction that the conduct of the Alien Property Custodian and his methods of dealing with the trusts, which it was his duty to protect and preserve, will go down into history as the dark spot in our conduct of the war.

In conclusion permit me to say that it does not come with good grace for us to stand up and condemn the Germans for violating their treaties while we, in the face of our treaty and our pledge of friendship to the people of Germany, continue to hold on to this property. I hope that the Members of this Congress will demand of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce an immediate consideration of this subject and the speedy report and passage of a bill which will permit us, as far as we may, to right the wrongs already done and to return this property to its rightful owners in a legal and orderly way.

During a conflict following the War of the Revolution our Government seized property belonging to British nationals. I trust with all my heart that the sentiment expressed by Alexander Hamilton relative to that property will be the sentiment of this House and of this country:

> No powers of language at my command can express the abhorrence I feel at the idea of violating the properties of individuals, which, in an authorized intercourse, in time of peace, has been confided to the faith of our Government and laws, on account of controversies between nation and nation.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I will withhold my point. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DEAL] wishes to make a request. I withhold it for a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] moves that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will withhold my motion.

Mr. DEAL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it has been stated, I believe, on the floor here that the Boston Navy Yard is the only navy yard on the Atlantic coast large enough to take the Leviathan. It has also been stated that it will cost $1,000,000 or thereabouts to take the Leviathan from the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. back to Boston.

I wish to state for the information of the House that there is at Norfolk a Government shipyard which has a dry dock 1,000 feet long, and that there is 40 feet of water in the channel leading up to that dock, and that there is 40 feet of water on the mudsills of that dock, and we can take the ship from Newport News to Norfolk, a distance of 12 miles, if it is advisable, for docking and save this expense of carrying it from New York down to Newport News and back to Boston at an expense of $1,000,000.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Is it not a fact also that the Norfolk Navy Yard is not permitted to bid on this work?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

VETO MESSAGE—MASONIC MUTUAL RELIEF ASSOCIATION OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a veto message from the President, which was read by the Clerk, as follows:

To the HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES:

I am returning herewith H. R. 6380, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1869, as amended," without my approval.

If the act were to promote the fraternal service as it purports, it would be discriminatory and unfair to the Masonic order, which is an established institution dating from the beginning of our national life, which permits no service in its name for profit.

It is not conceivable that an organization is purely fraternal and benevolent which provides for a reserve fund required by law in the regulation of ordinary life-insurance companies, though the act stipulates a classification which exempts the association from Federal taxation. If it is desirable to have such a provision for fraternal insurance and the operation of benevolent institutions, there should be provision for compliance with the regulations of the superintendent of insurance and the limitation to any specific fraternity ought to be removed. Moreover, just consideration of our fraternal activities might well require the sanction of any fraternal order whose name is employed.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 20, 1922.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the President's message be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming moves that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 30. Joint resolution to amend a joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution giving to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines a preferred right of homestead entry," approved February 14, 1920.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leaves of absence were granted—

To Mr. OGDEN, indefinitely, on account of serious illness in his family.

To Mr. HAMMER, for one week, on account of sickness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 54 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, January 21, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The documents referred to are as follows:

Agreement between the United Kingdom and Japan, signed at London July 13, 1911.

PREAMBLE.

The Government of Great Britain and the Government of Japan, having in view the important changes which have taken place in the situation since the conclusion of the Anglo-Japanese agreement of the 12th August, 1905, and believing that a revision of that agreement responding to such changes would contribute to general stability and repose, having agreed upon the following stipulations to replace the agreement above mentioned, such stipulations having the same object as the said agreement, namely:

(a) The consolidation and maintenance of the general peace in the regions of eastern Asia and of India;

(b) The preservation of the common interests of all powers in China by insuring the independence and integrity of the Chinese Empire and the principle of equal opportunities for the commerce and industry of all nations in China;

(c) The maintenance of the territorial rights of the high contracting parties in the regions of eastern Asia and of India, and the defense of their special interests in the said regions.

ARTICLE I.

It is agreed that whenever, in the opinion of either Great Britain or Japan, any of the rights and interests referred to in the preamble of this agreement are in jeopardy, the two Governments will communicate with one another fully and frankly, and will consider in common the measures which should be taken to safeguard those menaced rights or interests.

ARTICLE II.

If by reason of unprovoked attack or aggressive action, wherever arising, on the part of any power or powers, either high contracting party should be involved in war in defense of its territorial rights or special interests mentioned in the preamble of this agreement, the other high contracting party will at once come to the assistance of its ally, and will conduct the war in common, and make peace in mutual agreement with it.

ARTICLE III.

The high contracting parties agree that neither of them will, without consulting the other, enter into separate arrangements with another power to the prejudice of the objects described in the preamble of this agreement.

ARTICLE IV.

Should either high contracting party conclude a treaty of general arbitration with a third power, it is agreed that nothing in this agreement shall entail upon such contracting party an obligation to go to war with the power with whom such treaty of arbitration is in force.

ARTICLE V.

The conditions under which armed assistance shall be afforded by either power to the other in the circumstances mentioned in the present agreement, and the means by which such assistance is to be made available, will be arranged by the naval and military authorities of the high contracting parties, who will from time to time consult one another fully and freely upon all questions of mutual interest.

ARTICLE VI.

The present agreement shall come into effect immediately after the date of its signature, and remain in force for 10 years from that date.

In case neither of the high contracting parties should have notified 12 months before the expiration of the said 10 years the intention of terminating it, it shall remain binding until the expiration of one year from the day on which either of the high contracting parties shall have denounced it. But if, when the date fixed for its expiration arrives, either ally is actually engaged in war, the alliance shall, ipso facto, continue until peace is concluded.

In faith whereof the undersigned, duly authorized by their respective Governments, have signed this agreement, and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at London, the 13th day of July, 1911.

E. GREY,
His Britannic Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

The Government of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan and the Government of the French Republic, animated by the desire to strengthen the relations of amity existing between them and to remove from those relations all cause of misunderstanding for the future, have decided to conclude the following agreement:

"The Governments of Japan and France, being agreed to respect the independence and integrity of China, as well as the principle of equal treatment in that country for the commerce and subjects or citizens (i. e., ressortissants) of all nations, and having a special interest in having order and a pacific state of things guaranteed, especially in the regions of the Chinese Empire adjacent to the territories where they have the rights of sovereignty, protection, or occupation, engage to support each other for assuring the peace and security in those regions, with a view to maintaining the respective situation and the territorial rights of the two contracting parties in the continent of Asia."

In witness whereof, the undersigned, His Excellency Monsieur Kurino, ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of His Majesty, the Emperor of Japan, to the President of the French Republic, and His Excellency Monsieur Stephen Pichon, senator, minister for foreign affairs, authorized by their respective Governments, have signed this agreement and have affixed thereto their seals.

The treatment of the most favored nation shall be accorded to the officers and subjects of Japan in French Indo-China in all that concerns their persons and the protection of their property, and the same treatment shall be applied to the subjects and protéges of French Indo-China in the Empire of Japan until the expiration of the treaty of commerce and navigation signed between Japan and France on the 4th of August, 1896.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on January 20, 1922, the President had approved and signed the bill (S. 2708) to authorize the President to transfer certain medical supplies for the relief of the distressed and famine-stricken people of Russia.

INTERCHANGEABLE MILEAGE TICKETS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 848) to amend section 22 of the interstate commerce act by permitting the issuance of interchangeable mileage tickets on railroads, and for other purposes.

Mr. KELLOGG obtained the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to make a brief statement.

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator in order that he may make a statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent order entered into yesterday no amendments to the pending bill may be offered after the hour of 12 o'clock arrives. I think Senators should be afforded an opportunity to offer amendments. I desire to submit an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which I ask the Secretary to state.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The READING CLERK. In the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, on page 1, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the word "empowered" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "directed."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, with the indulgence of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], I shall claim the attention of the Senate for a few moments. I have proposed an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] striking out the word "empowered," in line 6, on page 1, and inserting the word "directed."

Under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as it now stands authority is given the Interstate Commerce Commission to require the railroads to issue mileage books, and the commission is left to determine the rate at which the books shall be issued. Under the pending bill railroads are required to issue mileage books at a rate of 2½ cents per mile, the commission being authorized to readjust or to change the rate at any time it may find it necessary so to do.

It has been suggested that the adoption of the amendment which I have offered to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa will render that amendment much less objectionable but not entirely satisfactory to the proponents of the bill. Under the bill which the Senate is now considering the rate of 2½ cents a mile is to go into effect upon the passage of the bill, unless its enforcement be enjoined by a court of competent jurisdiction upon the complaint of the carrier alleging that the rate is confiscatory; that, under the Constitution of the United States, it constitutes a denial of due process of law.

In this connection I desire to say in regard to the constitutional question which has been raised that I think the pending bill may readily be distinguished from the law, which was held unconstitutional in the Michigan case. If the correct construction of the Michigan case is that no distinction may be made as between wholesale and retail sales of transportation, then the constitutional objection would, in my opinion, apply as much to the amendment which the Senator from Iowa has offered as to the bill which is now presented. Congress can not empower the commission to perform any act which the Congress itself may not do.

I do not think, however, that a proper application of the decision in the case of the Lake Shore Railway Co. against Smith, in One hundred and seventy-third United States, which was quoted from by the Senator from Iowa, can have the effect of precluding the constitutionality of this act. In my opinion, the true application of the decision is that in the particular case tested under the Michigan statute the rate was held confiscatory and to be an unreasonable and unjust regulation. My opinion is that the legal question to be determined upon the passage of this proposed act is whether the rate fixed by Congress is confiscatory, unfair, unreasonable, and unjust, and is a proper exercise of the legislative power. Mr. President, in so far as I am concerned, I shall somewhat reluctantly accept the Cummins amendment if the amendment which I have proposed to that amendment be agreed to by the Senate.

It has been stated during the course of the debate that the objection to relegating the matter to the Interstate Commerce Commission grows in part out of the fact that delay will result. I myself have felt that that is a material and a substantial objection. On the other hand, the power of the commission to readjust the rate which is fixed in the bill is recognized by the bill itself, and there is no purpose on the part of any advocate of the bill to change that provision; so, after the passage of the bill, if it should become a law, upon the application of any carrier alleging that the rate fixed in the law is too low, the commission could hear and determine the question and readjust the rate. In the meantime, in all probability, if the carriers elected to do so, they could, by order of a court of competent jurisdiction, enjoin the enforcement of the 2½-cent rate until the question of its validity might be determined. So, in my opinion, with the modfication of the Cummins amendment which I have suggested, there is not enough left in the controversy to justify the Senate in prolonging the contest.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to direct the question which I am about to ask both to the pending bill and to the amendment, and before asking the question I want to make a brief statement, if I may.

I think, of course, Senators concede that what might be a reasonable rate in one section of the country, let us say western Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, might not be a reasonable rate in the intermountain regions. I was told on yesterday by one of the Senators from Colorado that the rate in the intermountain regions ran from 3 cents per mile up to almost 5 cents per mile. I have not the exact figures; but, assuming such rates to be reasonable in the intermountain regions, then it must follow that the rate of 2½ cents per mile, if adopted, would be confiscatory.

My question is this: Assume that either the original bill or the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa is enacted into law, would it be within the power of the commission to say that the proposed mileage books could be used in one section of the country and not be required in another, if they should find that the rate might be confiscatory in one section and not in another? In other words, would either of these measures, if adopted, give to the commission that latitude and allow them to establish one rate in one section and another rate in another section?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The rate fixed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for passenger travel is 3.6 cents per mile. As I said on yesterday, that rate applies to every State in the Union except three, the three exceptions being Arizona, Utah, and Nevada. In Arizona the rate fixed by the commission is 4.8 cents, in Utah it is 4.8 cents, and in Nevada it is the same. I have assumed—and I have no doubt that it is the true construction of the amendment I have offered—that suitable rules and regulations can be made that will provide for the use of the mileage books which might be issued in these three States. Mark you, the amendment which I have proposed does not make the mileage books good for intrastate travel, and I understand the Senator from Arkansas intends to offer an amendment, if we shall ever come to a vote, striking out that feature of the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana.

for I think none of us want directly to prescribe rates for intrastate travel.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield further to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa provides that the interchangeable mileage books shall be "good for interstate passenger carriage upon the passenger trains of any and all other carriers by rail." That being an affirmative provision of the bill, I feared that whatever rule might be adopted would have to be consistent with the provisions of the bill which would require these interchangeable tickets to be used on all roads. That is my difficulty.

Mr. CUMMINS. The bill also provides that the commission shall prescribe the rate at which the books shall be issued and that the rate shall be fair and just and reasonable.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; but that means the same rate, I take it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think that is a necessary construction of the amendment at least.

Mr. POMERENE. My thought about it was this, and this is what I feared with both bills—that if the Interstate Commerce Commission saw fit either to raise or to lower this rate they would have to raise it or lower it in the same proportion throughout the entire country.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true of the bill that is before the Senate. It is not true, in my opinion, of the amendment or substitute.

Mr. POMERENE. I am afraid the same objection lies to both. I hope I am wrong about it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I yielded to the Senator from Arkansas to make a statement, and I want to give him all the time necessary. I only wish to say that there is a very short time left. I do not want to interfere with the statement, but I would rather Senators would not get into a general discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON. In reply to the question of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], I think the language of the amendment, giving the Interstate Commerce Commission liberal authority to make rules and regulations for the execution of the act and to determine its application, would perhaps cover the point that he has raised. I want to direct my remarks, however, in the brief time for which I feel justified in claiming the further attention of the Senate, to other propositions.

I have said that I thought the true constitutional question involved is whether the legislative rate is confiscatory, and that if the bill should pass the burden of proof would be upon the complaining carrier to establish that fact. If the Cummins amendment, as modified by my amendment thereto, is agreed to, the commission will be directed to require the issuance of mileage books, but will have authority to fix whatever rate the commission finds to be just and reasonable. If the bill passes, as I have already explained, the authority of the commission in that particular is limited to a readjustment of the rates in order to coordinate them with other rates in force, and avoid injustice and undue discrimination. This case, as I have already said, is easily distinguishable from the Michigan case. Upon that point I shall detain the Senate only a moment or two.

In the Michigan case the statute authorized the issuance of books in blocks of 1,000 miles, made them good for two years, provided that the family of the purchaser might use them, and made the books redeemable. Under this bill the limitation is 5,000 miles, although I have repeatedly said that I think that it ought to be reduced to 2,000 miles. The books are to be good for only one year, can be used only by the purchaser, and are nonredeemable. In the Michigan case the charter of the railroad company authorized it to exact 3 cents per mile as a passenger rate, and while there are expressions in the opinion in the Lake Shore case which might form the basis of an argument that the decision goes much further than I assert that it does, in my opinion the gist of the decision is that the rate in the Michigan case was unreasonable and unjust because it was confiscatory and unduly discriminatory, and the courts have repeatedly declined to expand the doctrine of that case. They have announced that it is their purpose not to do so.

Statutes and municipal ordinances requiring street railways and railroads to carry school children and soldiers at half fare have been uniformly held constitutional, on other grounds, however, than that involved in the decision in the Lake Shore case. It must be apparent that if an act requiring school children or soldiers to be transported at half the maximum passenger fare does not constitute a violation of the due-process clause of the Constitution such an act as this could readily stand the constitutional test.

I have said, and I repeat, that in my opinion, if the amendment that I have suggested to the Cummins amendment is agreed to, the difference that will then exist between the two propositions would not justify the proponents of the bill in further contesting the adoption of the Cummins amendment, especially in view of the risk the friends of the bill would take in having the Cummins amendment as originally proposed adopted by the Senate.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to any Senator who wishes to introduce an amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk in case the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] does not prevail.

Mr. HARRIS. I offer an amendment to the bill, which I send to the desk.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask, in view of the fact that these amendments must all be voted upon, that they be read at the desk as they are presented.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] proposes the following amendment:

Amend said bill by striking out from lines 3 and 4, on page 2 of the bill as printed, the comma following the word "carrier" in said line 3, and the words "without regard as to whether the points of origin and destination for any single journey are within the same State."

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] proposes the following:

That two years after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for a common carrier to use a passenger car in any train used in whole or in part for the transportation of passengers for hire unless such car is constructed of steel, and that the use in passenger trains of wooden cars between or in front of steel cars is prohibited.

Mr. CUMMINS. I give notice that I shall raise a point of order upon that amendment.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss this bill thoroughly, but the time allowed for discussion is so short that I shall confine my remarks principally to one feature.

Do I understand that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is willing to accept the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]? If so, it will make some difference in my remarks.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas; and, if I may be permitted, I will state in a word why I am willing to modify my substitute in that way.

My objection to the bill under consideration, as so often stated, is that we ought not to withdraw from the Interstate Commerce Commission the power we have given that body to fix fair and reasonable rates, and we are not qualified to do that work. I am in sympathy with the desire of many people that there shall be interchangeable mileage tickets, and therefore I regard the amendment as substantially in accord with the principles I have urged; and I intend to accept it so far as I can.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I shall not undertake to discuss the constitutional question involved in this bill, but it is perfectly evident to anyone that at least it is a very serious question. In my opinion, the law as introduced is unconstitutional; but the acceptance of the amendment by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] will render it unnecessary to discuss that question, because the question can be raised before the commission, and raised on the enforcement of an order, without tying up all the rates in the country, as would be necessary if an injunction were brought against the enforcement of the law itself. Then we would have no law.

I am heartily in favor of the bill as finally agreed to by the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Iowa, for the reason, among others, that the commission now has not the power to require a uniform mileage book. I shall state only one reason. I am not going into the general argument. I have not the time.

When we conferred upon the commission the power to make joint passenger and freight rates and routes, we provided, by section 4, that—

In establishing any such through route the commission shall not * * * require any carrier by railroad, without its consent, to embrace in such route substantially less than the entire length of its railroad and of any intermediate railroad operated in conjunction and under a common management or control therewith which lies between the termini of such proposed through route, unless such inclusion of lines would make the through route unreasonably long—

And so forth. So the commission could not to-day require a completely interchangeable mileage book, and that is a complete answer to the claim that the commission have neglected to consider and take up the subject.

Suppose a mileage book were to be made over the Union Pacific Railroad from Omaha to Ogden. The Union Pacific could object to the mileage book reaching Ogden by way of the Denver & Rio Grande. It is perfectly reasonable, in making a joint freight route, that that should be a provision of the law, because the carload of freight does not need to stop off at any intermediate station. In passenger rates I think the mileage book must be uniform all over the United States, so far as requiring all railroads to honor it is concerned, if it is going to be of any benefit to the traveling public.

I am heartily in favor of such a mileage book. I believe that it will be a great convenience to the traveling public. There are objections, of course, to issuing a 5,000-mile mileage book for a cent a mile less than the general public has to pay. It would be in the interest of a class of people who are able to buy the ticket; but I shall not stop to discuss that question, because it is not involved in the amendment which the Senator from Arkansas has made to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, one word more upon this general subject.

The commission have not neglected to consider passenger rates. Immediately after the commission made the reduction of from 12 to 16 per cent in grain, grain products, and hay in December, it made an order of its own motion and started in on an investigation of all passenger and freight rates in order to determine whether the high rates of freight and passengers were justified in view of the general commercial and economic conditions. That investigation involves the very question which has been argued upon this floor, and the contention made—in which I think there is much weight and reason—that the present high rates are discouraging transportation and business.

I know that the commission believed, when they made the reduction in the rate on farm products from 12 to 16 per cent, that such was the case. There have also been reductions in the rates on various other articles of about 10 per cent, and more than 500 reductions have been made over the country in the rates on different commodities and articles, because the general percentage of the rise in rates all over the country threw them out of line. You can not raise and lower all the rates in the country on a percentage basis without throwing them so out of line that one community will be discriminated against, or one individual industry will be discriminated against, in favor of another. It can not be done wthout that result. I might say that that is the best illustration of why Congress should not enter into the details of fixing rates.

Mr. President, I have been somewhat familiar with the rate question ever since the Granger cases of 1873, 1874, and 1875. It is true that the first laws passed fixing rates were passed by the States, but it was soon found that the fixing of rates involved questions of discrimination between communities and sections of the country, and between industries; involved the question of how much certain traffic could stand; involved so many elements that must be technically studied by a commission that it was necessary to create commissions, and nearly all the States have created commissions. I wish to say that Minnesota was one of the first States to create such a commission; my colleague will bear me out. I think we created our commission in 1891 and gave it authority to fix rates, and that authority has been exercised ever since. The authority thus given to commissions over the country has been of very great benefit.

Then Congress came along and established the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1887, and some time later, in 1902 or 1904, I have forgotten which, we gave the commission power to fix rates, both passenger and freight.

Mr. President, I do not object to the mileage-book proposition. I want to accomplish its authorization in the constitutional and most efficient way. I believe it to be absolutely impossible for Congress to enter into the subject of itself fixing rates.

Let me illustrate. I think the discussion of this bill within the last few days has illustrated the absolute impossibility of it being done without a careful study and technical knowledge. During the very able speeches of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] there never were over 15 Senators, and most of the time not over 6 or 8 Senators, on the floor listening to them.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator might observe with equal propriety that not exceeding that number is present to hear his own remarks.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was going to remark that I do not claim to attract any more Senators than the very able and distinguished Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Iowa, but the subject of fixing rates over this country is very technical and requires an extensive study of economic conditions, questions of discrimination, and questions of what the traffic will bear; for I say that to-day it is a serious question whether traffic in many articles will bear these rates, especially those on lumber, coal, and farm products; I mean the large staple products.

Let me illustrate: Take the question of merchandise. I do not mean heavy merchandise; I mean dry goods. Really, it does not make much difference what the rate is on some of those articles, but on stock, grain, coal, and lumber the rates are so high to-day as to be a tremendous burden upon the public.

But, Senators, that is a question which ought to be settled by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We ought to give them the power on this question of mileage books, and I have no objection to giving them a direction.

Mr. President, ought we to depart now from a policy which has been established in this country since 1888; from a policy which the Congress has frequently refused to depart from; from a policy which was adopted by the States of laying down the general rules and committing the details of rates to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to the commissions of the various States?

Let me illustrate. When the Director General made his order for a 25 per cent increase in rates all over the country it was made, of course, in a hurry, without investigation by the Interstate Commerce Commission or any technical body. Immediately it was found that when those rates were raised a percentage they were greatly out of line with each other, not only as between communities but as between commodities.

What does discrimination mean? A half cent a hundred pounds on heavy products between competing communities may control the traffic. There are questions as to what the raw material in bulk should pay as compared with the manufactured article, and when you add 25 per cent to a light merchandise rate it does not amount to much. When you add it to the rate on cattle, coal, and lumber, great commodities, it amounts to a great deal.

A 25 per cent increase in a local rate which is higher on account of the short haul, as compared with a 25 per cent rate on a through haul reaching 2,000 miles over the country, throws one absolutely and entirely out of line with the other, and the commission found in a very short time, Mr. President, that the Director General's order had so thrown the rates of this country out of line that the commission had to go to work under the order of the Director General and remodel many of the rates of the country in order that one community would not be discriminated against in favor of another.

Does anyone believe that if a bill was introduced in the Senate to increase the rate on one commodity it would ever get through the Senate without Senators tacking onto it or discussing practically every commodity of the United States and every rate in the United States? The Congress could not go over the subject in three months.

Mr. President, there are actually thousands of changes in rates every year, because of changes in commercial, economic, and competitive conditions in the country, and especially has that been true since the percentage raise which was made by the Director General and the percentage raise which was made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission did to some extent apply temporarily a percentage raise on a great many articles, but not on all. They did that because the law required them to increase rates within a certain length of time, and immediately they went to work, and they have informed me that a great deal of their time has been taken going through individual cases, and my recollection is that between 500 and 1,000 reductions in rates on commodities and articles throughout the country have been made within the last six months in order that the rates should not be excessive and should not be discriminatory as between communities, individuals, enterprises, businesses, and commodities.

I realize that at best the question is a difficult one. I believe, however, that the most crying need to-day is for a reduction in farm products, in building materials, including coal and lumber, which are necessary, of course, not only to building but to manufacturing throughout the country. I believe that the first thing which should be done by the commission—although they are considering, and should consider, the passenger rates at the same time—is to relieve the business interests, the farmers, the manufacturers, and the builders of the great burden placed upon them by these rates, and that must of necessity involve an examination of the incomes of the roads. It must also involve an examination of what steps have been taken, and are being taken, for the reduction of operating expenses.

I am glad to say that the operating expenses last year were very greatly reduced over 1920. The reports of the Interstate Commerce Commission for the years 1920 and 1921 show that 93.59 cents of every dollar received in 1920 by the railroads was paid out for operating expenses. In 1921 only 82.67 cents of every dollar was paid out for operating expenses. That shows a gratifying reduction, but the reduction in operating expenses must go further. I can not, in the time I have, discuss the details of that.

I am very glad that the Senator from Arkansas and the Senator from Iowa have agreed on a form of amendment, and I shall heartily support it.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I, too, am glad that an agreement has been reached upon this amendment. There is no question that both freight rates and passenger rates are too high. The real question is the proper way to get at the problem. The bill in its original form, to my mind, would entail a great deal of uncertainty, and perhaps would prove a very dangerous precedent for us to establish. Therefore I am glad an agreement has been reached upon an apparently satisfactory solution of it.

The objection I have to the present method, however, is as to the slowness with which the Interstate Commerce Commission acts. I am very much persuaded to believe that our governmental agencies spend too much time in investigation. It has been something like two years since the Government turned the railroads back to the private owners, and it would seem to me that sufficient time has elapsed in which to have gotten the situation more nearly back to normal.

It is my impression that those representing the ownership of the railroads, and perhaps certain other elements in the country, have been harboring the idea of Government ownership. So far as I am concerned, and so far as my vote can affect the matter, I want those people and anyone else in the United States who may have any such lingering idea to dismiss it from their minds, because we do not want Government ownership in business any more in this country and, so far as my vote will help to prevent it, will not have it.

The Interstate Commerce Commission is composed of 11 members. I rather incline to the belief that it is a little cumbersome as a body, although I know they have a great deal of work to do. I am very much in favor of smaller bodies, and a little more rapidity of action. They could well pattern after a man down in my county, Jim Harris. Jim is a fine fellow, but always in a hurry. His motto is, "Go ahead and do something, even if you do it wrong." I rather believe that some of our governmental agencies could profit, in part at least, by following Jim's advice, to "go ahead and do something."

When we sit down now to make a study of these matters, the mass of figures that is presented is such as to cause us to become bewildered, and we hardly know what to do. I presume everyone in the United States over 15 years of age outside of Congress knows the reason why passenger and freight rates are not reduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will suspend a moment. The hour of 12 o'clock having arrived, the unanimous-consent agreement goes into effect, which provides that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than five minutes upon the bill, or more than once or longer than five minutes upon any amendment offered thereto. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. DIAL. I will hasten along. I had forgotten about the time limit.

I am a little bit afraid that the Congress will stumble around for another year or two, and we will only then discover the reason why we do not reduce the rates, but I still have a little hope in that direction.

We have two boards or governmental agencies in control of this matter, one the Interstate Commerce Commission and the other the Labor Board. I am delighted that I fought the Esch-Cummins bill with all the power that was in me. I had been in the Senate only a few months, was a "baby" Senator, but I had the temerity to make a few remarks against that bill and have been proud of them every day since.

The idea of creating a Labor Board to fix wages and at the same time giving the Interstate Commerce Commission power to fix rates was contrary to all business principles, from my viewpoint.

Not only that, but the idea of a Labor Board, composed of three men representing labor, three men representing the railroads, and three men representing the public, was absolutely wrong. That is letting the parties involved, the plaintiff and the defendant, as it were, sit as members of the jury. We never get anywhere with an arrangement of that kind.

I am in hope that the Interstate Commerce Commission will get right down to business and revise a whole lot of our railroad laws. What the Congress should do is to repeal the Labor Board act and, if we need any such agency, give that authority to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and then if the 11 members of the Interstate Commerce Commission can not take care of that work, reduce the number to five and perhaps they can do it then; or we could repeal that authority altogether.

We must get back to a business basis. There are rules and regulations governing the railroads of the country that are absolutely inconsistent with present conditions. So far as the men who operate the trains are concerned, I believe they should have good pay, extra good pay, but there are many railroad employees, common labor on the railroads, enjoying two or three times the amount of pay that is given for similar work in the same territory in other lines of business.

I believe that the best interests of the railroads and the best interests of the country generally require that the railroads be permited to employ their own help in their own way. They should be unrestricted. Their hands should be untied and free in order that they may negotiate themselves with their own people. It is absolutely inconsistent with efficiency and good business, in my opinion, to have labor and capital antagonistic. They should get together; talk their problems over. I believe they can make better terms and get along better, not only in their own interest but in the interest of the public, if we untie their hands in this respect. Let them work and live in harmony, taking an interest in each other's welfare. Rates must come down else all industry will continue to languish to the injury of everyone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I believe the bill presented by the committee should be preferred by the Senate to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa. The substitute will no doubt, in the first place, result in a long-drawn-out delay before any action is taken by the Interstate Commerce Commission. By the time the commission gives due notice, carries on formal hearings, and then reaches a decision, I prophesy this, that it will be one year at least before we will get any action upon the part of the Interstate Commerce Commission looking to any relief whatever.

Even when that relief finally does come it is very uncertain whether it will be of any real benefit in the way of a reduction of passenger rates. I am more inclined to the opinion that it will not result in any benefit or any relief to the traveling public. I doubt seriously if the Interstate Commerce Commission will require any reduction. They will probably issue an order that mileage tickets, as a matter of convenience, shall be issued at a rate similar to that charged for the ordinary ticket.

We have upon the statute books at the present time a provision giving a guaranteed earning to the railroads of at least 5½ per cent; that is, they have the privilege of earning sufficient to result in their having a net return of 5½ per cent. With that provision still upon the statute books, which a number of us have urged should be repealed, the Interstate Commerce Commission probably would have its hands tied by legislative enactment, even if it desired to make the reduction.

I think the time has come——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL I have only five minutes. I wish to be courteous, but I only have five minutes and can not yield.

I think the time has come when Congress should express itself upon the subject emphatically, and that we should enact the measure now pending providing for the issuance of mileage books at 2½ cents a mile, and that we should not adopt any substitute measure which in all probability would defeat the purpose of the public having any such relief as proposed by the bill having the approval of the committee.

I proposed an amendment to make the mileage tickets for 1,000 miles instead of 5,000 miles, believing that if we place the amount of mileage at 5,000 it will be a discrimination very largely against those who are not of sufficient financial means and who do not do sufficient traveling to purchase a 5,000-mile book. Of course, a 5,000-mile book is better than none at all, and I heartily favor this if we can not get the mileage reduced to 1,000 miles, or, say, 2,000.

The policy of having mileage tickets from 1,000 to 5,000 miles is recognized in the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa. His substitute provides that the mileage ticket shall be from 1,000 to 5,000 miles. When the railroads formerly sold mileage books they also sold them in books of 1,000 miles. I hope my amendment will be adopted, so that if the Senate in its wisdom sees proper to accept the committee bill instead of the substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa, we will then have a provision that requires the issuance of mileage books of 1,000 miles and in a larger amount of mileage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask that the pending amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the reported bill, on page 1, line 4, after the word "nontransferable," it is proposed to strike out "five" and insert "one," so it will read "shall issue interchangeable nontransferable 1,000-mile tickets.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment is that proposed by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], which the Secretary will report.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Amend the bill by striking from lines 2, 3, and 4, on page 2, the comma after the word "carrier" and the words "without regard as to whether the points of origin and destination for any single journey or within the same State."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment is that offered by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who is the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] have reconciled their differences so far as the substitute amendment is concerned. I wish to say that in the form in which the bill was presented originally I would feel compelled to vote against it.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], in opening his address on yesterday, spoke of the chaotic condition of the railroads and of substantially everything pertaining to them. The bill as it is presented here would make conditions even more chaotic, viewing them from the financial standpoint. It may or may not be that the Interstate Commerce Commission is not functioning properly. I have very great respect for the commission and I have very great sympathy for them in the great burden of work that is placed upon them. That burden was increased tenfold by the actions of the Directors General of Railroads during Government operation and control.

If this bill as it was originally presented is to pass, then we shall have the Interstate Commerce Commission functioning upon the subject of rates, and we shall have the Congress of the United States trying to deprive them of a part of their powers and legislating with respect to rates, when I am quite sure no Senator thus far has indicated that he is clear in his own mind that many of the railroads could continue to operate if this bill were to pass.

I am in sympathy with the general proposition that all rates, passenger and freight, should go down, but I am not prepared to say that I have sufficient knowledge to decide whether 2½ cents per mile is a sufficient rate in Florida or in the plains of the interior of the country, or is sufficient in the intermountain regions. A rate which might permit the roads of the Middle West to prosper would impoverish the roads of the intermountain regions. Are we to become so reckless in our Federal legislation that we shall care nothing for the railroads in the mountain regions? Those sections are a part of this country, just the same as Ohio and Indiana and Illinois and Iowa are a part of it. I want to get a maximum of efficiency from the roads, and I want them to be reasonably encouraged.

Senators, I do not believe we appreciate what we are doing when it is attempted to provide by legislative act that one rate shall apply to all the railroads wherever they may be. If this bill shall pass, then to-morrow or the next day some one will want a special rate for watermelons, another man for cabbage, and another man for brick. I have felt all the while that many of the existing rail rates have discouraged shipments. Let me give an illustration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. POMERENE. I submit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the end of the bill it is proposed to add a new subdivision, as follows:

(4) That two years after the passage of this act it shall be unlawful for a common carrier to use a passenger car in any train used in whole or in part for the transportation of passengers for hire unless such car is constructed of steel and that the use in passenger trains of wooden cars between or in front of steel cars is prohibited.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. The unanimous-consent agreement under which we are acting provides as follows:

That no amendment not germane shall be considered.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from Georgia is not germane to the subject matter of the bill under consideration. When we all agreed to submit to the limitation provided in the agreement, this part of the agreement was inserted for the very reason that it was known that if every amendment possible under the general rules of the Senate were to be submitted it would be impossible to consider such amendments and debate them within the time fixed by the agreement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia contest the point of order?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I am not so familiar with parliamentary rules as are other Senators; but if a provision relative to the character of passenger cars which may be used is not germane to legislation proposing to fix passenger rates, then I can not understand why that is not so. In this connection I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the last annual report of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I read from their recommendations to Congress as follows:

That the use of steel cars in passenger-train service be required, and that the use in passenger trains of wooden cars between or in front of steel cars be prohibited.

Mr. President, the Interstate Commerce Commission are more familiar with the railroads and the finances of the railroads than is anyone else. They are certainly in a position to know the necessity for the recommendations which they make and whether or not the financial condition of the roads is such as to enable them to arrange to substitute steel cars for the the wooden cars which may now be in use.

My amendment provides that the requirement as to steel cars shall take effect two years from the date of the passage of the act. When Congress compelled the adoption of automatic car couplers it was found that some of the roads were not financially able to install them and that some of the roads could not meet the requirement for other reasons; so the time for their compliance was extended. If some of the roads are not in such financial condition that they can provide steel cars within two years, Congress can extend the time within which they shall do so. Congress has always been reasonable in reference to such matters, and the railroads, I may add, have always had plenty of friends in Congress.

Mr. President, while it is important that we should reduce passenger fares, we should also not delay longer giving protection to the lives of passengers and employees. Experience shows that accidents to passengers and employees in steel cars are much less than in wooden cars.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is ready to rule on the point of order, and rules that the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia is not germane. Therefore, the point of order raised by the Senator from Iowa is well taken. The question now recurs on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan was adopted. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, struck out of the bill as reported on page 2, lines 3, 4, and 5, the words "without regard as to whether the points of origin and destination for any single journey are within the same State."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I was under some misapprehension when that amendment was proposed; in fact, I did not quite understand its reading from the desk. If the proposed benefits under this measure are to be participated in or realized at all by commercial travelers whose travels are exclusively within a particular State or largely so, then, with the provision stricken out, as proposed by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], they will not enjoy the privileges proposed to be extended to commercial travelers and others under the original bill.

Of course I know there is some constitutional question involved as to whether or not under the law the Interstate Commerce Commission, if this bill is enacted, could issue an order that would require the sale of mileage books for use by local travelers within a State; and it is doubtless on account of that constitutional question that the amendment was proposed; but I believe, Mr. President, that the bill should be allowed to stand as originally drafted, and then subsequently the question may be settled and determined as to whether or not the privilege of the use of mileage books will be extended to include intrastate travel in the respective States.

The original bill provided that mileage books should be issued regardless of whether the point of origin and destination were within the State where the ticket was sold. With that provision stricken out, when the Interstate Commerce Commission comes to issue rules and regulations for the enforcement of the law we know of course that there will be no opportunity or chance whatever for commercial travelers representing firms within a given State and confining their travels within that State and for the citizens of a given State traveling within that State to participate in the benefits of the law.

I hope that the amendment will be reconsidered and that the bill will be allowed to stand as it originally came from the committee. Then this question may be subsequently determined, and, if possible, traveling salesmen whose labors are restricted within the borders of a particular State and the traveling public whose travels are largely within a particular State may obtain some benefit under the bill. If the amendment stands as adopted, there is no question that they will receive no benefit whatever under this measure. I desire for the bill to retain the provision under which the people of my State—commercial salesmen or others—may have the privilege of obtaining mileage tickets that can be used in traveling within Florida. The amendment of the Senator from Michigan strikes this paragraph from the bill. I am opposed to his amendment. It should be reconsidered and defeated.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it is to be hoped, if the Cummins amendment as amended is agreed to by the Senate and passes the body at the other end of the Capitol and becomes law, that the mileage or mileage scrip books which will be issued under the direction of the Interstate Commerce Commission may obviate the difficulties which manifestly exist in an effort upon the part of Congress to prescribe a rate to be fixed according to which mileage or mileage scrip books may be issued and may be made applicable to journeys entirely intrastate.

It is true, as suggested by the Senator from Florida, that the friends of this bill, including the legislative representatives of some of the commercial travelers' associations interested in its passage, regard the provision of the bill which has been stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Michigan as of such doubtful validity that they approve of the elimination of that language, although we all realize that it may occasion inconvenience to those who are to become the beneficiaries of the proposed legislation if the pending bill should become law; but I think, in view of all the circumstances, that the action of the Senate in adopting the Townsend amendment is justified, and I shall reluctantly vote against the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida to reconsider the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] was agreed to.

The motion to reconsider was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. I renew now my parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. Has the amendment which I have proposed by way of a substitute been modified in accordance with the suggestion or amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas? I am willing to accept that amendment and modify the amendment which I have offered accordingly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the modification of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, on page 1, line 6, after the word "is," it is proposed to strike out "empowered" and to insert "directed," so as to read:

> The commission is directed to require, after notice and hearing, each carrier by rail subject to this act to issue at such offices as may be prescribed by the commission joint interchangeable mileage tickets—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in the nature of a substitute, as modified. [Putting the question.]

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it has been my lot to see the beginning and the evolution of all the legislation that has been passed to regulate and control railroad transportation. I was a Member of the House in 1887 when the first interstate commerce act was enacted. That law gave relief in one direction only. It aimed to prevent discriminations, but it left the commission entirely without any power to regulate rates. In 1906 we first equipped the Interstate Commerce Commission with the right to fix rates, and that rule has continued until the present day; but in the last railroad law we injected a new condition. Before that it was in all cases left to the discretion of the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rate, governed only by the rule of what was just and reasonable. In the last railroad law a new rule was enacted—not, as many supposed, a guaranty of rates, but practically a direction to the Interstate Commerce Commission that they must be governed by the 6 per cent profit rule; that is, they must make such rates that the carrier would secure a return of at least 6 per cent.

Mr. President, that rule by itself, under present conditions, works unjustly.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that that rule expires by its own limitation on March 1.

Mr. NELSON. I am glad it does. I want to call attention to that now. That is the only attempt of which I know in the law to aid capital in securing an income. I venture to say that there is not a farmer in this country, if you take into account his overhead expenses, his depreciation, and small wages for himself and his family, who has earned the operating expenses of his farm in the last year; and there is nothing in the interstate commerce law that states or even intimates that the Interstate Commerce Commission shall give consideration to those facts.

Mr. President, the one great relief that is needed by the American people to-day is the reduction of transportation rates in respect to the products and necessities of the agricultural interests of this country. Unless relief is given in that direction, most of the relief that we attempt to give by legislation will be a failure. If the capitalists and the manufacturers and the railroad magnates could realize how our farmers are handicapped and ground down to-day by these high rates, they would surely be ready to give us relief.

I realize that one great handicap and drawback, and the worst of all, in reference to the reduction of railroad rates, is the high cost of living. The railroad men are still insisting upon war-time wages; and until there is a reduction in those wages, until railroad wages come down to more reasonable levels, it is hard to get the reduction in railroad rates that we ought to have.

If there is any one thing that is needed at this moment, it is a reduction in railroad rates on agricultural products, coal, and lumber. I sincerely trust that the Interstate Commerce Commission will take up that question and dispose of it as speedily as possible. Unless our agricultural interests can be put on their feet again and given an opportunity to regain their old-time prosperity, we shall never have prosperity in this country as we had it in the days before the war.

I sincerely trust that the Interstate Commerce Commission will speed up in this matter and not dilly-dally as they did with the last 10 or 12 per cent reduction that they made. My recollection is that they made a reduction of 10 per cent and then held it up after they had made the order for more than a month, God knows for what.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Minnesota has expired. The bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word before the vote is taken with reference to the remarks just made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. The Senator has stated this, but I wish to emphasize it:

Referring to the provision of the present law with regard to a 5½ or 6 per cent return, while it has been stated throughout the country that it operates as a guaranty to the railroads of that return, of course every Senator in this Chamber knows that it was not a guaranty; but, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] stated yesterday, even upon a valuation of $12,000,000,000 the returns of the railroads during the past year have not been more than 5 per cent, or have fallen short of the 5½ or 6 per cent directed. If the condition of the country had remained as it existed at the time this law was passed, the railroads would have been entitled to have the same return that this law directed the Interstate Commerce Commission in fixing rates to give them if there had not been a word on the subject in the law, because under the Constitution of the United States a railroad is entitled to a reasonable return upon the actual value of the property devoted to transportation uses, and at that time there was no man in the United States who could urge that 5½ or 6 per cent was an unreasonable return; but conditions have changed. I agree with the Senator from Minnesota that under existing conditions, where the farmer, the manufacturer, and, in fact, nearly everybody in the United States, has to suffer losses, or a very low return, there is no reason why the owners of railroad properties ought not to bear their share of the burden of this financial depression. This direction expires on the 1st day of March, as has been stated, and after that time it will no longer be in the law.

Now, just a word in reference to the pending bill.

I have long been interested in the subject of securing interchangeable mileage books. I have introduced a bill upon the subject; but I am satisfied that under existing conditions the compromise that has been reached is the best that can be obtained. Under it, if the House will agree, it is assured that interchangeable mileage books will be issued, will be compelled by the Interstate Commerce Commission to be issued, and at a substantial reduction, because there can be a substantial reduction without loss of revenue from the existing single-fare rates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 22 of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, as amended, is hereby amended by inserting "(1)" after the section number at the beginning of such section and by adding to the section two new paragraphs, as follows, to wit:

"(2) The commission is directed to require, after notice and hearing, each carrier by rail, subject to this act, to issue at such offices as may be prescribed by the commission joint interchangeable mileage tickets at a just and reasonable rate per mile, good for interstate passenger carriage upon the passenger trains of any and all other carriers by rail subject to this act. Such tickets may be required to be issued for any distance not exceeding 5,000 miles nor less than 1,000 miles. Before making any order requiring the issuance of any such tickets the commission shall make and publish such reasonable rules and regulations for their issuance and use as in its judgment the public interest demands; and especially it shall prescribe whether such tickets are transferable or nontransferable, and if the latter, what identification may be required; and especially, also to what baggage privileges the lawful holders of such tickets are entitled.

"(3) Any carrier which, through the act of any agent or employee, willfully refuses to issue or accept any such ticket demanded or presented under the lawful requirements of this act, or willfully refuses to conform to the rules and regulations lawfully made and published by the commission hereunder, or any person who shall willfully offer for carriage any such ticket contrary to the said rules and regulations shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be fined not to exceed $1,000."

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend section 22 of the act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, as amended."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 9724, the Treasury Department appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The reading of the bill was resumed, beginning on line 9 of page 12, and the reading clerk read to the bottom of page 13.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I observe that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is now in the Chamber, and I recall that just before the bill was laid aside yesterday the Senator asked a question with regard to the reduction of the number of employees in the departments.

Mr. KING. In the Treasury Department.

Mr. WARREN. The question was a general one, because the Senator spoke of 37,000, and so forth.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. I stated that at the moment I might not be fully informed, but I thought we had reduced the number in one department, meaning the War Department, some 20,000 or so. I have looked up the facts this morning; and I find that in the case of the War Department, where, for instance, on Armistice Day there were 37,403 employees in the department and in the field, on the 19th day of January there were 5,863. So that in the War Department, here in Washington and in the field, the reduction has been slightly over 84 per cent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that before the war the War Department did not have 5,000 clerks; and when the War Department was swelled until there were 4,000,000 men or more in the service, and there were hundreds of camps and billions of dollars' worth of property which was in the custody of employees of the Government who were in the War Department, obviously the number would be greatly increased. It was promised that when the property was sold there would be very great reductions.

Mr. WARREN. Let me say to the Senator that there will be further reductions. I am reporting only the progress thus far. The responsibilities of the War Department because of the war are still very large. For instance, one branch of the War Department is going over war claims. It is reconsidering claims, some of which have been already settled, and where there is evidence of fraud or mistake they are reopened. In one case, I remember, where we collected nearly $200,000, there was a fault in material that was furnished on the part of the contractors, and a pursuit of that firm brought about the settlement. There are nearly 500 men employed there. That branch of the department will almost go out of existence in a short time, probably.

Mr. KING. I notice in one part of this bill, I am not sure of the page, provision is made for caring for a large amount of material. We have been trying for years, as the Senator knows, to get rid of this material, and, as I recall, although we passed peremptory statutes directing the sale of the enormous war supplies, the War Department seems to have failed to discharge its duty, and failed to carry out the mandates of the Congress. I am not sure how far they are now carrying out the wishes of Congress, but more than three years after the war we still have, I am advised, hundreds of millions of dollars worth of surplus supplies.

Mr. WARREN. There is a great deal of property, but it is being disposed of continually, and some delay is essential in order that we may get the best prices for the property. The percentage of the prices in most lines has been very large. Of course in the case of landed property, cantonments, and so forth, the loss has been extremely heavy, but in the matter of the commodities which are movable the percentage has been, considering all the circumstances, large, partly due to the fact of their taking advantage of the market and not undertaking to slaughter. It will be closed out in due time.

Mr. KING. Of course the Senator knows that if there had been reasonable diligence in disposing of the commodities and supplies left over immediately following the war the Government would have saved tens of millions of dollars in expenses, and could have sold the commodities and the supplies for hundreds of millions of dollars more than will be received. I think the former administration was at fault in failing to prosecute with diligence the sale of this property.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 14, page 14, in the items under the heading "Public debt service."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am unable to understand why so much is required—$3,700,000—for clerk hire for that rather small division of the Treasury Department—the public debt service. Of course I have not had the advantage of reading all the testimony that was taken by the committee.

Mr. WARREN. I hardly think the Senator wants to minimize that department.

Mr. KING. It is important, of course.

Mr. WARREN. We have something like twenty-odd billions of securities out, and many of them have to be exchanged. For instance, last year there was $4,560,000 appropriated for that service. This year they estimated $4,000,000, and we have given them $3,700,000.

Mr. KING. It seems to me that is entirely too much, Mr. President. I do not like this provision, either, which says that the Secretary of the Treasury may employ as many as he may deem necessary. There seems to be no restriction on the number or on the compensation to be allowed.

Mr. WARREN. The amount of money is restricted.

Mr. KING. He may utilize the entire fund and hire as many as he pleases up to the amount of $3,700,000. The Senator knows that deficits are often brought in when the appropriations made by Congress for a given purpose are exceeded.

Mr. WARREN. Very seldom in connection with this service. Another thing, as the Senator will see as we go further along, the salaries are restricted. They can go to only $1,800.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 19, page 18, the last paragraph read being as follows:

For collecting the revenue from customs, including not exceeding $200,000 for the detection and prevention of frauds upon the customs revenue, $11,300,000.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator how much is carried in the bill for the enforcement of law and for the detection of violations of law? I notice this item, $11,300,000. Then I presume there is a very large sum appropriated for the enforcement of various laws, including the Volstead Act. Does the Senator know what the aggregate is?

Mr. WARREN. This is probably the largest single item, and this is $250,000 less than the estimate, and is the same as last year's appropriation for this purpose, although the responsibilities of the Customs Service are almost bound to be greater. As to the whisky part of it, if the Senator means that, the prohibition enforcement, there is proposed to be appropriated about $10,000,000 altogether; but the committee amendments, if adopted, will reduce that some hundreds of thousands of dollars, but less than a million. It will be probably in the neighborhood of $9,000,000, even should the amendments be adopted.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that $11,300,000 is necessary for the enforcement of the law? The Senator will remember that the amount collected will be less for the coming year than during the past year. The machinery is presumed to be very much less in volume and in character than heretofore. It seems to me there would be a gradual reduction in this tremendous amount for detecting fraud and for enforcing the law.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator's argument is good along one line, but there are other lines which cross it. In the first place, I scarcely think there will be money enough. We are dependent, in the estimates made this year, very largely upon collections of taxes. In the last appropriation bill we added 600 inspectors; we had a large number before, and I think they have collected some hundreds of millions of dollars. I have seen it stated that they estimate that they propose to collect as high as three or four hundred millions more. They are now working, as I have very regrettable knowledge, having heard from them on the year 1917. Then there are the years 1918, 1919, 1920, and 1921 yet to be inspected, and that will take some of the money. While the Senator may say in his remarks that he would wish it otherwise, yet I imagine that in his heart he will not feel so bad when he considers that there will probably be a tariff enacted within the next 12 months which will require some attention. But I hardly believe that the appropriations are asked for with that in view. They are based upon the duties as they are now.

Mr. KING. The Senator knows there has been a very large army of inspectors and employees in the past who have been making investigations of the income-tax returns.

Mr. WARREN. Not so large in that branch of the service, when you come to consider the vast amount of business they have to handle. We have been very wickedly slow in giving them the appropriations they have asked for, and the number of men they have asked for. I remember as long as four or five years ago, we provided for a thousand less examiners. They have had perhaps only a hundred or less, and we have held back. At the time when we gave them these 600 there were more asked for, and I think to-day the estimate will show that they still require more. But it has been the opinion of the committee that with what operatives they have, if they speed them up to the limit, they can make all proper examinations.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator know whether or not these new men who will be put on will be under the Civil Service?

Mr. WARREN. They will be.

Mr. KING. This is not, then, merely a plan for the purpose of filling a number of positions with politicians?

Mr. WARREN. It is not. I wish to say that even in the prohibition enforcement work they started to divide in the matter, and it was necessary, of course, in prohibition cases to have some who were near to the men in charge, as we always do with Cabinet officers—allow them to have one or two near them as their own particular secretaries.

There has been an order just issued releasing perhaps one or two out of 40 or 50 that may be from any given State, but there is not the faintest suspicion of the matter of political preference in it. It is merely so they can have experts along lines that are not very easily examined by the Civil Service Commission in their examinations.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator whether the bill contemplates that additional collection districts will be created?

Mr. WARREN. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. KING. There is no estimate, then, for additional districts. The Senator knows that an effort has been made along that line.

Mr. WARREN. I think it would require legislation for that. I believe they now have the full complement they are allowed by law.

The reading clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 3, to increase the appropriation for compensation in lieu of moieties in certain cases under the customs laws from $10,000 to $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Bureau of the Budget," on page 19, line 5, after the words "Director, $10,000," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That section 2 of the act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and for other purposes, approved July 31, 1894, shall not be construed as having application to retired officers of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard who may be appointed to the offices created by section 207 of the Budget and accounting act, 1921, approved June 10, 1921, within the meaning of precluding payment to such officers of the difference in pay prescribed for such offices and their retired pay.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming if it is the object of this amendment to enable the Budget branch of the service to employ officers of the Army or Navy or Marine Corps?

Mr. WARREN. It is in order that an officer of the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps could retire and, if employed in this position, instead of drawing $10,000, he would draw the difference between his retired pay and the $10,000. It is a matter of economy. It is necessary to introduce the amendment in order to cover that point.

Mr. KING. It is not for the purpose of enabling officers who because of physical or mental defects have been retired to be put into the service of the Government at advanced pay?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; not at all. I will state to the Senator the present condition of things. I think the papers have demonstrated it sufficiently so that I may say that the present Budget officer took the place at great personal loss himself and under an agreement to keep it one year. We have a man trained for that character of service, who has a lifetime training, formerly one of the paymasters of the Army, a man who has demonstrated unusual ability in the War Department in the settling and handling of claims.

If the President should desire to appoint that man and he wishes to retire, the President can retire him because he has served years enough to entitle him to retirement, and this is for the purpose of enabling the President to appoint him to take up this work if he so desires. There is no reason why he should not have the same pay altogether that others would have, as he is a very experienced and able man. I do not mean that the language is personal in its terms, because the President can take any man out of the Navy or Army or Marine Corps who may be fitted for the purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LENROOT in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading clerk continued the reading of the bill to the bottom of page 20, the end of the item relating to the Federal Farm Loan Bureau.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the chairman of the committee if there is any reduction at all in this item?

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that that entire item and all referring to the Federal Farm Loan Bureau is the present law. The appropriations are the same as heretofore.

Mr. HARRISON. I have not examined it. Does it include officers throughout the country?

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; those are institutions entirely separate and apart from the Farm Loan Bureau. While the Washington office in a way controls them, yet they are like the Federal reserve banks in the different places.

Mr. HARRISON. They pay their own help?

Mr. WARREN. Entirely. The capital is loaned and the business is handled entirely by the branches.

The reading clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 12, to reduce the appropriation for salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, deputy collectors, gaugers, storekeepers, and storekeeper-gaugers, clerks, messengers, and janitors in internal-revenue offices, rent of offices outside of the District of Columbia, telephone service, etc., from $4,288,000 to $4,000,000, and to add the following proviso:

Provided, That upon application of the owner or upon the initiation of the commissioner and under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, distilled spirits may be removed from any internal-revenue bonded warehouse to any other such warehouse, and may be bottled in bond in any such warehouse before or after payment of the tax, and the commissioner shall prescribe the form and penal sums of bond covering distilled spirits in internal-revenue bonded warehouse and in transit between such warehouses.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I confess that I am not very familiar with this matter, but I offer an amendment rather in behalf of another Senator, who is more familiar with it, than in my own behalf. I move to amend the amendment by inserting on page 25, line 13, after the word "That," the words "for purpose of concentration"; and as a necessary part of the amendment the words "application of the owner or upon" in line 13 should be stricken out, so that it will read:

That for purpose of concentration upon the initiation of the commissioner—

And so forth.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers the following amendment to the committee amendment, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 25, line 13, strike out the words "application of the owner or upon" and insert in lieu thereof the words "for purpose of concentration."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I submit another amendment to the committee amendment. In line 16, after the words "internal revenue," I move to insert the word "distillery," so it would read:

Distilled spirits may be removed from any internal-revenue distillery—

And so forth.

Mr. WARREN. I would not be able to accept that amendment. That will perhaps prevent the concentration that we desire. I will ask the Senator not to press that, as I could not accept it.

Mr. KING. Would not the Senator be willing to accept it and let it go to conference, so that, with full information which may be obtained in the meantime, the conferees would then be able to dispose of it in a way that would be entirely just to the Government and to all individuals? There seems to be a controversy, I admit.

Mr. WARREN. It is a matter which the committee has examined very thoroughly. I would not be authorized to accept the proposed amendment, because the committee was not willing to accept it, for no other reason than that we would thus in a way undertake to defeat in one part what we attempt to accomplish in another part. It would require then the accumulation only in distilleries. There are very large quantities involved. We have bonded warehouses which are owned and handled entirely by the United States and which would be under the same surveillance as the distilleries. However, the distilleries were not constructed with the intention of accumulating great quantities of liquors for storage. Hence we would be unable to accumulate these whiskies in the quantities that it is now intended, in order to cut off this tremendous expense for guards.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to suggest also to the Senator that the committee went into this matter pretty fully. We had before us briefs in favor of the amendment and the representatives of persons who own from 75 to 85 per cent of these liquors through warehouse receipts, and so on. The principal effect, as I see it, of this amendment will be to continue the monopoly which the distillers have upon the bottling of the liquor. The testimony goes to show that their charges are very exorbitant in that respect, and the committee did not feel that we ought to continue the monopoly that they apparently have under the law, under which they can charge practically anything they wish for the bottling of the liquors.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am as much opposed as any Senator can be to monopolies.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I knew that, and that is the reason I made the suggestion which I have to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have always opposed monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade, and since coming to the Senate have frequently denounced trusts and combinations which I believed to be operating in the United States. I would not knowingly support any proposition which looked toward a monopoly, and the amendment which I have offered, as I am advised, is not intended to create or foster a monopoly. Permit me to state that the question under discussion is terra incognita to me. I have only a superficial knowledge of existing laws relative to bonded warehouses, distilleries, and questions relating to the withdrawal of liquors therefrom. I am offering this amendment because I understood that a Senator who is compelled to be absent desired to have it presented for the consideration of the Senate.

Undoubtedly there are two sides to the question, but in fairness to both sides and out of consideration for the absent Senator I have offered the amendment just submitted. I am advised that this amendment deals with a matter which is not considered of importance by those who are earnestly in favor of enforcing existing laws. In other words, the amendment does not weaken present laws and affects only the interests of the owners of liquors now in warehouses and distilleries. Whatever controversy there is is between distillers who have the custody and possession of liquors owned by others and such owners as desire to remove the same to other warehouses.

As I understand, it is in the interest of law enforcement to concentrate in as few places as possible the liquors now on hand in the distilleries and warehouses. If most of the liquors are in distilleries, it would seem that they should remain there until they are bottled ready for sale. At any rate, if they are removed to various warehouses and scattered and diffused throughout the country, it is claimed that there is greater danger of theft and evasions of the law than if the liquors remained in the present distilleries and were there bottled ready for withdrawal under the provisions of existing statute. However, as stated, I know but little about this question, and can not express any fixed conviction as to what is the best course to pursue.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that I presume we are in possession of all the information which is available in reference to the matter. We gave audience to all those who wished to address the committee on the question; we held the matter open for two weeks; and the committee rejected the proposition.

Mr. KING. My understanding is that those who are interested in the amendment which I have just suggested did not have full opportunity—and I am not saying that the committee denied them a hearing—to be heard, but, perhaps, that was the result of misunderstanding.

Mr. WARREN. I think it was because the witness who desired to make a statement with reference to the matter was himself too busy, for he submitted a brief in reference to the subject at the time, although when other witnesses were being examined he was invited to come before the committee if he desired to do so.

Although it may not be strictly apropos, one of the briefs which were presented to the committee was prepared against the bill which has been introduced in the other House. However, as to the main question, I do not think that any witness or anyone who desired to testify will accuse the committee of having been otherwise than considerate of their wishes.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SHIELDS. The Senator from Utah indicates his lack of familiarity with the facts concerning this matter.

Mr. KING. What I have stated is based upon information conveyed to me. I have made no personal examination, and have only such general interest in this matter as any Senator would have.

Mr. SHIELDS. I am not very much more informed than is the Senator in reference to the subject, but I received a letter this morning from a very highly reputable firm, who were formerly wholesale distillers of whisky in Memphis, Tenn., a very old house, in whose statements I have absolute confidence. The writer of the letter gives me some of the details of the situation, and states that the charges of the present bonded warehouse are four times what they formerly were; that they are taking advantage of the situation and absolutely ruining the men who still have some money invested in whiskies and who are awaiting an opportunity for a proper, legal disposition of them. Furthermore, liquor is not so safe in the private warehouses as it would be in Government warehouses. Fraudulent withdrawals of liquor have occurred largely because of the lack of Government protection. According to the statement of the letter to which I refer, this is a very beneficial provision, and I hope it may be retained in the bill.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Tennessee what is the fact in reference to the liquors which are in the warehouses of distillers? Are they not protected just as much as if they were in Government warehouses?

Mr. SHIELDS. I am not familiar with that matter; and I do not know whether or not the Government maintains guards at such warehouses.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator allow me to say a word?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is stated by those who claim to have investigated the matter and who claim to know, that there has not been a single theft from the Government warehouses; that all of the thefts of record have been from the warehouses of distillers.

Mr. KING. This, of course, is general legislation, and my information is that the subject is now receiving consideration in the other House; that a bill is there being considered—known as the Green bill—which deals with the entire subject of taxation of liquors, the manner of their storage, and the method by which they may be withdrawn from warehouses and sold. It deals with the liquors in distilleries as well as that in all classes of warehouses. The bill treats the entire matter as if it was an original proposition, while we are now proposing to change existing law and to engraft on an appropriation bill provisions which modify existing statutes.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will permit me to make a suggestion right there, I desire to say that the Senator keeps himself well advised as to these matters, and I think can have no possible difference with the committee about this subject. This item is in the nature of a reduction of an appropriation. While we never have specifically adopted the Holman rule, which is the rule in the other House, this item would come in under that kind of a rule, which, I think, perhaps would be a good rule to be adopted by the Senate, in accordance with which we might consider items, even though they may carry certain legislation, if thereby expenses may be reduced.

I have only to say, not as an excuse for, but as the reason for our considering a provision like this which borders upon legislation, that it saves large expenses. It is not the intention of the committee, and certainly it is not the intention of the chairman of the committee, to invade the territory of legislation any further than is strictly necessary in recommending these appropriations. In fact, it is our intention not to invade the domain of legislation at all except when it becomes permissible, because there are excellent reasons for doing so.

Mr. KING. If it is economy which the Senator from Wyoming seeks, and I pay tribute to his desire for economy, I suggest to him a recommendation which was submitted by one who is familiar with this subject. His position was that in view of the fact that the great bulk of liquors are now in the possession of distillers and in their warehouses—and thus concentration is substantially accomplished—the Government should require the distillers and all others holding liquors in storage to give to the Government bonds in large amounts conditioned upon the secure keeping of the liquor and the prevention of its being withdrawn except in conformity with law. The suggestion was further made that if the present custodians were charged with the responsibility of securely keeping the liquors the Government would be relieved of the cost, which is very great. This plan contemplated that the Government would make frequent inspections to see that the liquor was secure and that there were no withdrawals except in the manner provided by law. A statute could be passed which would impose severe penalties for failing to properly care for the liquors thus impounded—statutes containing penal provisions; and, at the same time, the bonds executed, conditioned upon the observance of the law and the security of the liquors, could also contain such provisions as to make the monetary liability very great.

At the present time the Government, as I understand, has to pay to guard the liquor in warehouses and in distilleries. I express no opinion as to the wisdom of this course, but it has been recommended, as I have been advised, by some who are deeply interested in the enforcement of the law and would not support any proposition which in any manner relaxed rules and regulations formulated to prevent the illicit sale of intoxicating liquors.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not looked up the law with reference to the proposition the Senator has just presented. I think there is some law on the statute books along those lines, but just how far it goes I do not know. However, I desired to interrupt the Senator to say, in regard to his suggestion, that there is a bill pending in the other body covering this same subject; that a few days ago I examined the Green bill, to which he has referred, and, although I have not a copy of it at hand at the present moment, it is a bill that levies taxes of various kinds and specifies the rates under certain conditions. It is a bill embodying four or five pages, and contains provisions very different from those now under consideration in the pending bill. I think it embodies one provision practically similar to the provision now before us, but the Green bill is very much broader, and goes into the matter of levying taxes, and all that sort of thing.

The committee proceeded on the theory largely that this proposition is germane to this bill in that it tends to affect the appropriation by way of reducing expenses, and so on. I believe that under the rules of the Senate it is very proper, if it be thought necessary, to submit to the Senate the question of germaneness. I merely wish to add that we believe it will involve a considerable economy and will save the Government possibly several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to read from a memorandum which I have a few words on the subject of these amendments.

The effect of this insertion—

That is, the amendment that is now before us—is to concentrate in distilleries, and to restrict bottling in bond to distillery bonded warehouses under the terms of the existing statute with respect to the bottling of distilled spirits in bond, being the bottling in bond act of March 3, 1897.

These amendments will prevent indiscriminate removals in bond, the entire operation being subject to the management of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. They will prevent indiscriminate bottling of distilled spirits in bond at general bonded warehouses, where all kinds of liquors and other merchandise are mixed in storage, and without making sweeping changes in general statutes will enable the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to order and supervise removals of distilled spirits in bond for the purpose of economical concentration and reduced expense of supervision.

As I have said, my knowledge of this matter is limited, but it seems to me that the argument suggested possesses merit. I commend it to the committee and to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah offer the amendment?

Mr. KING. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The READING CLERK. On page 25, in line 16, after the words "internal revenue," it is proposed to insert the word "distillery."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if I understand this amendment, it may all be reduced to a sentence. If the amendment shall be adopted, all the bottling in bond will be done in distillers' warehouses and not in any other sort of warehouse.

As to the claim that liquor is subject to theft and depredation in other warehouses, there is nothing in it. The whisky in Government warehouses is not stored indiscriminately with other things; it is stored in a separate place, doubly locked and barred with guards over it, and hitherto such depredation as has taken place has taken place in distillers' warehouses.

The distillers control the distillers' warehouses and the charges for bottling. It is claimed they are charging entirely too much. Whether that claim be true or not is another matter; but it would seem that the evidence shows it to be true. However, Mr. President, something between 75 and 85 per cent, as the Senator from Washington said, of all this liquor is owned, not by distillers but by banks and trust companies and various people with whom the certificates have been deposited as collateral security or into whose hands the liquor has come by way of foreclosure. To leave the distillers a monopoly of the entire bottling-in-bond business, to permit them to charge the present exorbitant prices, and to refuse to allow bottling in bond to go on in other Government warehouses not under the control and managament of the distillers and subject to their charges, seems to me to be a rather indefensible proposition.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator that if it is desirable to concentrate these liquors in as few warehouses as possible—and I am advised that is conceded by all—and a large portion of them are now in the warehouses of distillers, and it is charged that they constitute a monopoly and that their charges are exorbitant, it occurs to me that the Government would have the power to fix reasonable charges for bottling and storage. This course would prevent any monopoly and would prevent the liquors being scattered throughout the land and stored in a multitude of warehouses.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, that would make the legislation subject to just the objection that the Senator was attempting to make a moment ago. It would be new legislation.

Mr. KING. The Senator misunderstands me. I am not making that objection at all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It would be an objection, nevertheless. It would be new legislation.

Mr. KING. The same as this.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is new le[illegible]ation only in one sense; not in that sense.

Mr. President, I want to make one point quite plain, and that is that as far as loss from theft or other depredation is concerned, or from unlawful removal, it would be greater and has been greater in the distillers' warehouses, bonded warehouses, than in the others.

Every man knows that at present the only way in which any of this liquor can be disposed of in bonded warehouses is after it is bottled. The physicians will not prescribe it except as bottled, and the druggists neither will nor can sell it except as bottled. If we are going to leave the bottling business entirely in the hands of the distillers they will control the bottling business, and these men owning 75 per cent or 80 per cent of the certificates entitling them to ownership, or which would have entitled them to ownership and disposition without prohibition, are left helpless, and they can not sell what they own to the druggists nor upon physicians' prescriptions. If the sole object of the legislation were to concentrate this liquor, it would be very much better to take it all out of the distillers' warehouses altogether, and put it in the other Government warehouses—much better.

Mr. KING. Except for the reason that it is in the distilleries now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Except that it is there now; but if the Senator says the object was to concentrate it, that requires removal anyhow, and concentration at some other place; and if that removal is contemplated at all, it would be better to remove it from the distillers' warehouses and cut off the distillers entirely from the management.

It seems to me that the amendment—while that, of course, is not its intention—can have but one effect, and that is to perpetuate a quasi monopoly which is not of much good to anybody except the man who collects the fee for bottling.

Mr. KING. If this amendment would have that effect, I should regard it as very objectionable. As I said to the Senator from Washington a few moments ago, perhaps no Senator, at least since I have been here, has inveighed as much against monopolies and trusts and combines as I have; and if the result of this amendment would be to create a monopoly, I should be very much opposed to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or to continue it.

Mr. KING. Or to continue a monopoly. I suggest, however, for the consideration of the members of the committee that if the object is concentration—and I am told by those who desire the enforcement of the Volstead Act, as I desire it to be enforced, that concentration is desirable—it is easier to prevent the unlawful disposition of liquors if the stock on hand is in a few places and can be carefully guarded and inspected. If that is desirable, then it occurs to me that if the greater part of the liquors are now in the warehouses of the distillers, legislation would be wise that left them there, but subjected the distillers to rather drastic regulations with respect to bottling, costs of storage, and particularly guarding and protecting the same. In this manner any possible monopoly could be prevented and the owners of the liquors could be fully protected. I agree that it would be unjust and unfair for distillers who have the liquors of others in their possession to charge unconscionable prices for bottling or for storage; but that could be regulated by the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When this liquor was deposited it was the property of the distiller, it belonged to the distiller, and therefore very naturally it went to the distillery warehouses. Since that time the property in it has passed, to the tune of 75 to 85 per cent, to other people from whom the distiller borrowed money. So long as the distillers paid the prices of bottling their own liquor among themselves, and the warehouse got the money, and the individual distiller paid it, it was not such a horrible thing in its practical operation as it is now, when the interest of the owners of 85 per cent of the product is affected. It seems to me it is perfectly right to give everybody the opportunity to have the liquor bottled, and perfectly right to let them bottle it wherever it happens to be, whether in a distiller's warehouse or in another Government bonded warehouse. That is all that this legislation does. What the Senator's amendment would do would be to enforce its bottling in bond only in distillers' warehouses.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, right in that connection I wish to suggest to the Senator that under the language of the amendment as it is submitted by the committee this liquor could be bottled and it could be concentrated in distillery warehouses. It is left to the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, but if the Senator's amendment is adopted, then it can only be sent to the distillery warehouses. The amendment submitted by the committee is broad in its scope, leaving the discretion to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. If he finds it advisable to concentrate part of this in a warehouse, he can do it under this amendment, but if he thinks it is not advisable to do that, then he can put it in the others; but under the Senator's amendment he is absolutely limited to the distillery warehouses.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? In that case the inevitable effect is to create a monopoly in the hands of the distillers.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Absolutely.

Mr. FLETCHER. They can charge what they please.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is very clear.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as stated, I have no interest in this matter, and but limited information concerning it.

I have submitted the amendment, at the request of others, in the absence of a Senator, for the consideration of the Senate. My only interest is to see that the question is fairly presented and that both sides of the matter may be fairly considered. I am, of course, interested in seeing the law enforced. Under the eighteenth amendment authority to deal with the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes is committed to the Federal Government. Congress, pursuant to this granted authority, has enacted the Volstead Act, and I am in favor of enforcing that act. I favor ample appropriations for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the law.

If the amendments which I have suggested at the request of others are in the interest of the proper enforcement of the law and are consonant with justice and the property rights of those concerned, they should be adopted. If not, they should be rejected.

The first amendment, it is conceded, is desirable from every standpoint. It is conceded, as I am told, by those who are most zealous in seeking the enforcement of the Volstead Act that it is desirable to concentrate these liquors in as few warehouses as possible. It occurred to me that if these liquors, or a large part of them, are now in distilleries, it would be in the interest of the enforcement of the Volstead Act to retain the liquors there until they are withdrawn pursuant to law, and such a course would not injure those who own the liquors. It is known that in removing liquors from warehouses and in taking them throughout the country and depositing them in other warehouses the risks resulting from theft and loss are very much greater than if they remain in secure warehouses. If the objection to their being retained in the distilleries is that the distillers are charging extortionate prices for storage and bottling, then Congress can very quickly regulate that matter by appropriate law. It can authorize the Internal Revenue Department to promulgate such reasonable rules and regulations respecting bottling, storage, and so forth, as would prevent any form of monopoly or any injustice to the owners of the liquors.

Mr. President, I have submitted the amendment to the Senate, and shall content myself with asking for a vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, just one word. The suggestion is made by those seeking to change the committee amendment that the stuff would be safer from depredation in the distillers' warehouses than in the other Government bonded warehouses. I want to read a statement which I believe to be true—it is true as far as I have been able to verify it—in connection with that suggestion. It is to this effect:

> This suggestion is wholly untrue. The whisky so stored—

That is, in the other Government warehouses, not the distillers' warehouses—> is in compartments wholly apart from all other merchandise. The walls are of brick or concrete; the windows are barred; the doors are of double iron, and only the representatives of the Government have keys.

Only the representatives of the Government. No distiller has any keys there, and therefore there can not be any underground complicity between the distiller's key and a man who wants to take the whisky out of the warehouse. So it is safer in the other Government warehouses than it is in the distillers' warehouses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Wyoming whether he would be willing, as I am compelled to leave the Chamber in a moment, to refer to an item on page 47, to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate?

Mr. WARREN. I shall be glad to accommodate the Senator.

Mr. KING. It reads:

> National archives building: For site of building, including $25,000 for technical services, $500,000.

I oppose that item, Mr. President, and I am anxious to know whether the committee is going to press it. The Senator will remember that when the matter was up for consideration a year ago the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] opposed the proposition then pending to utilize two parcels of ground on either side of Ohio Avenue, and then bridge the Avenue, practically thus closing the Avenue. He insisted that the Government had ample ground of its own in other places, and I think he made most convincing arguments. Indeed, they were so convincing that the Senate accepted his view.

I have been told by a great number of persons, some in Government employ and some outside, who are familiar with the subject, that the Government has ample ground of its own more suitable for this archives building than the place which

I am told some persons have in view. We all desire that the Government shall have an archives building. There is no controversy over that matter; but I am opposed to expending $500,000 to enrich some real estate men, and to help the owners of some part of the town where they have real estate, when the Government itself has ample ground suitable for this building.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that as to the locality which was under consideration a year ago, to which the Senator from Alabama objected, there is no intention to use that site. It is used for another purpose. This provision for an archives building is an old provision of law. We are in very close circumstances about it. Even with all the temporary buildings the Government has, and in spite of all the care we are exercising, we are paying hundreds of thousands of dollars yearly for rent. By providing this archives building, and taking out of the great buildings, like the State, War, and Navy Building, and equally good buildings, tons and tons of the archives and papers, and permitting the rooms which are occupied by that material to be used by the officers and clerks, we will save all of this rental.

I do not know that one-half of the $500,000 would be used. The proposition is to put it where those representing the Government can provide a suitable site. As the Senator said, you might say the Government has land enough to build a town of archives buildings, but in a great many places where the Government owns property there are little pieces, lots and parts of lots and blocks, which belong to individuals, and they must be purchased or condemned, and, as I understand it, it is proposed in this case to use land which would probably cost, if we had to buy it, two or three or four times that amount of money, but we would buy only that which would complete the lots and blocks sought to be used, and not have to close the thoroughfares of the city. As the Senator knows, there are some blocks, so called, in the city, which are four times the size of some other blocks. I hope the Senator will not oppose this. We may lose it in conference, but it certainly is of great importance, and we would like to have it included.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask if the committee has in mind a definite location for the building contemplated by this appropriation?

Mr. WARREN. There is, in general terms, one contemplated. Of course, the Senator knows that it is a little injudicious to speak of sites in view when an appropriation of this kind is being made.

Mr. FLETCHER. I realize that.

Mr. WARREN. But it is now contemplated to put the building at a point which I am sure will be entirely satisfactory to both the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Utah.

Mr. FLETCHER. It looks like a pity to spend $500,000 for a site if we already have the ground and can utilize our own land.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator would examine these sites, as I, with some others, have done, he would discover we are rather restricted within the radius of convenience as to some pieces we would have to obtain. If we put this at the outside limits of our ownership, of course a great deal of transportation would be required, clerks going back and forth, taking their time. So that has to be considered, together with the other facilities and the expenses of running it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I recall the discussion when the Senator from Alabama opposed a certain definite tract, and I remember favoring that at the time. I understand the Senator to say now that that is out of the question?

Mr. WARREN. It is not under consideration in any way.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is being used for some other purpose?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think at that time it was said there were some temporary buildings on it, but that it was expected those temporary buildings would be removed and that the site would be available by the time we were ready to proceed with this building. I thought that site was a very well-chosen place and would be convenient to all the departments.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I send to the desk a letter on this general subject which I would like to have read without the signature. If Senators desire, they may have the signature.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

THE NEW WILLARD,
Washington, D. C., January 17, 1922.

The Hon. WILLIAM H. KING.
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I venture to write you in reference to the proposed archives building site covered by a committee amendment to the Treasury appropriation bill. I was in a discussion of this matter with some District engineers, and as an outsider as well as an engineer, interested in town planning in the West, I beg to submit some comments on the matter.

It appears that 15 or 20 years ago the triangular area between Pennsylvania Avenue and the Mall was planned out in detail for future Government buildings by a commission, and in 1908 a start was made by the purchase of the blocks on Fifteenth Street to be used under the plan for the State, Justice, and Commerce Departments, squares Nos. 226 to 230, together with the inclosed streets. In 1913, an archives building being needed, a commission reported the designation by the Secretary of the Treasury of the blocks between Twelfth and Thirteenth, B and C Streets, consisting of squares 294, 295, and the portion of Ohio Avenue between them, in accord with the general plan. The purchase of this site is now contemplated.

Before 1913 there was no doubt little objection to this site; Ohio Avenue was paved with grass-grown cobbles and Washington's traffic problem was in its infancy. The elimination of Ohio Avenue would make the buildings more regularly rectangular and would save some purchase money. To-day there is a material change in two respects: First, in the unexpected expansion of certain departments; and, second, in the even less-expected increase of street traffic.

As originally planned, the State Department was to have a new building on lower Fifteenth Street, leaving the State, War, and Navy Building to the military branches, but as a result of the war the War and Navy Departments withdrew, and the State Department is occupying, and will no doubt indefinitely occupy, the entire building. In view of the modern complexity of our foreign relations, it seems that its present quarters opposite the White House offices will be always its logical location. In consequence the block allocated to the State Department will eventually be used for other purposes.

Washington is, of course, fortunately equipped as regards broad streets and avenues, but its one-sided growth toward the northwest and the increase in automobile traffic (which the youth of to-day will see trebled) have produced great congestion in the business center of the city, with a maximum density in vehicles per minute on Pennsylvania Avenue from Fifteenth to Seventh Streets. The residential center of gravity is steadily moving northwest, while industrial development is southeastward, below the Mall and east of Fourteenth Street. In consequence, the avenues from northwest to southeast bear the heavy burden, while those from southwest to northeast, like New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and New York, are comparatively lightly used.

Inevitably the congestion on Pennsylvania Avenue will grow. Relief is obtainable only by paralleling the traffic, and for that purpose only Ohio Avenue is available. Since it was paved about three years ago it has been increasingly used as a through route, and by minor rectifications of the park roads below the Treasury, the market sheds at Twelfth Street, and the north line of the Mall between Sixth and Seventh it would attract a large fraction of the traffic now crowding Pennsylvania Avenue. Being the same width (160 feet) as Pennsylvania Avenue but having no street cars or dense pedestrian traffic, it already furnishes the quickest route from the Treasury to the Capitol during rush hours, and will eventually sustain an equal traffic.

The grave objection to closing Ohio Avenue by the Archives Building at Twelfth Street or elsewhere is thus apparent. I understand that the site of the War Industries Building at Fifteenth and B Streets, a two-story frame and stucco building now used by the Treasury Department for the excess profits tax division, has been suggested, and might prove an effective solution. It appears, however, that the Twelfth Street site having been designated for the purpose in 1913 under authority from Congress and the Fifteenth Street blocks having been similarly allocated in 1908, the interested officials are estopped from considering or suggesting a revision, and can only continue to request funds to carry out the purchase, as directed in 1913, until Congress directs them otherwise.

A general restudy of the problem would seem to be the logical proceeding. If a commission were appointed to include, for example, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Engineer Commissioner of the District, and other proper officials of the Government, with specific instructions to consider all previous designations or allocations as suspended, the problem would be solved satisfactorily both as regards governmental housing and traffic expansion.

I have roughly sketched out a traffic map which I inclose, which will, I think, help to show the importance of keeping Ohio Avenue open to traffic.

It will be noted that E Street is blocked by the District Building, D Street and C Street are less than half the width of Ohio Avenue and are blockaded by car tracks and also, in common with B Street, do not lead southeastward, and would, consequently, not attract any traffic from Pennsylvania Avenue, where relief is needed. Traffic conditions have grown so serious that the District Commissioners are contemplating drastic changes, but are finding great difficulty in working out regulations that will make a satisfactory improvement.

For the Government's own convenience facility of ingress to this triangular area when it is finally filled with Government buildings will be highly important, and the closing of the only broad thoroughfare in the area would appear to be a very short-sighted policy. Some irregularity, as witness the Senate and House Office Buildings, makes for a pleasant architectural contrast, rather than have narrow and dark streets for the only frontages. Building over streets may offer present economy, but will ultimately be highly expensive, and savors of "penny wisdom."

Yours, very truly, ——— ———.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate that your building commission must know whether we are going to have an archives building or not, and we have to know very quickly. If we build the archives building, we can take papers which are not called for perhaps once in a year, or once in two, and perhaps once in five years, and put them in the archives building, and by so doing we can obtain space which to-day, if we rented it outside, would cost $2.50 a square foot. Your commission has done everything in its power to utilize every foot of space in the public buildings in the District of Columbia, but still we have rents to pay outside.

I may add, Mr. President, that the Attorney General's office is in a rented building, the lease on which expires on the 15th day of June of this year, as I remember. The owners of the building are asking for an increase in the rent of some four or five hundred per cent.

Mr. KING. They had better go to the rent commission.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to my colleague that we are not going to pay it unless the Supreme Court of the United States say we must.

What your commission wants, and it is the unanimous view of the commission, is that we erect an archives building, not a temporary building but one that will take care of all the documents and records of the Government, many of which are not needed very often, and also an archives building that will take care of all records of every kind. In order that that may be done it must be located near the buildings in which the different departments are located. I hope Senators will not at this time, for obvious reasons, ask me the proposed location of the building; but if anyone will ask me at the close of my remarks, I will gladly tell him.

I wish to assure the Senate that your commission wants to save every single dollar that it is possible to save. I want you to have confidence in your commission and to believe that we are going to do that. The only question to decide is whether we are going to have an archives building. I say now without a moment's hesitation that if I had the power of the Government of the United States I would construct an archives building just as quickly as it would be possible to do it. We have records stored in all the basements of all the buildings of the Government, valuable papers that could not be replaced, papers of untold value to the American people, and yet we have no place to put them to make them safe.

Mr. FLETCHER. I might refer to the fire which took place not long ago in the Commerce Department Building, where some very valuable papers were lost that could not be replaced. I had occasion to look up recently some records from Georgia and Alabama, running back to 1812, that were lost and can never be replaced. I realize that we ought to have such a building, and that there is no question about it.

Mr. SMOOT. If Senators desire to know how crowded we are for storage space, let them go down to the Arlington Building and look in the basement and the floor above to see the valuable space that is occupied there by records. I do not ask for any elaborate building. I do not ask for marble and carved statues, and all the pillars of ancient Greece and Rome to be duplicated in this building. I want a large building, a fireproof building, a substantial building, that will serve the purpose of the Government of the United States for 100 years at least.

It would pay the Government 10 per cent upon its value in the release of space in Government buildings which we can use for better purposes and for office purposes, instead of paying exorbitant rents in the District of Columbia, as we are doing to-day, for other office space. I would not ask for 1 cent in the pending bill if it were not for the conditions which exist. There is not a Senator or a Congressman, if he will go down and make an investigation, who would not say that it is only good common business sense to erect an archives building. Now is the time to do it, too. There will never be a better time.

If we are not going to erect such a building, the commission will have to go out and rent space wherever we can. Records are piling up everywhere. We have records of the recent war piled up in New York. We have them piled up in Philadelphia. We have them scattered all over the United States. We can not bring them to the District because we have not any place here in which to put them. The only way to solve the difficulty is to construct an archives building.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, can the Senator from Utah give us this information? Will not the archives building, when constructed, make a great saving to the United States, because we will then not have to pay the high rent we are now paying for office space, and, in addition, the building will be much safer for the storage of our records?
